Esoteric Lessons.
An Argument Against Physical Causation.
The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 26. CHICAGO, ILL., JUNE 28, 1902. NO. 657.

NEW YORK NOTES.

Meetings, Preachers, Spiritualists. Liberals, Etc.

How fast the seasons fly away. The warm weather is with us and the churches and halls that are given over to spiritual and liberal meetings are fast closing their doors until fall. I hope you will pardon me for mentioning a matter which I have referred to in the past, and that is, that there is no service that a Spiritualist or Liberal can go to in this large metropolis during the summer months but an orthodox service. Is this right?

If one of our Unitarian churches could remain open during the summer there are many liberal clergymen passing through the city that would be pleased to devote one Sunday to the good cause.

A great shock to the community the past week has been the passing away of Rev. George H. Hepworth, of the editorial staff of the New York Herald. His sermons in the Sunday issue for the past ten years have been read by thousands, and I notice The Progressive Thinker has copied many of them. They were clear Spiritualism in a condensed form. The paper is deluged with letters asking the Herald to reprint the old sermons over again, which I trust they will. The funeral was held Tuesday in the Manhattan Congregational Church in this city. The church was crowded to the doors, and as Chopin's Funeral March was played by organ and violin, there was not a dry eye in the church. Dr. Robert Collyer, of the Church of the Messiah, and by the way had been a personal friend of Dr. Hepworth for forty years, delivered the eulogy, which was a grand effort because it was given from the heart.

A book published recently entitled "In the World Celestial," by T. A. Bland, M. D., I think ought to be read by every Spiritualist, it is so well written, and filled with good meat; in fact it is a book to make one think.

The Rev. George C. Lorimer, the Baptist minister, formerly of Boston, and now the pastor of the Madison Avenue Baptist church in this city, departs from his usual broad, temperate, and just attitude in his volume on "Christianity in the Nineteenth Century," and makes a severe arraignment of Spiritualism, Christian Science, and other philosophic concepts which he classes as "isms and schisms." In referring to Spiritualism he makes this statement, which to those conversant with the rich and deeply thoughtful literature of Modern Spiritualism is truly amazing, and indicates a strange ignorance on the part of one who assumes to speak for those who believe in this grand philosophy. He tells us that "from the countless alleged communications from the invisible world received since 1849 no ray of light has been thrown on the vexed problems which have for ages troubled mankind. We know no more of God, or the soul, or redemption, or destiny than we did before." And again he says, "Spiritualism, whatever else it does, has never illumined. There is no light in it. As a religion it is a religion without a message."

After turning from this ignorance (if I may be permitted to call it) on this subject, to another clergyman whose church is only several blocks from Dr. Lorimer's, to Rev. Minot J. Savage, who on the other hand after an exhaustive study of Spiritualistic literature, observes in his helpful work entitled Life Beyond Death, "The ethics of Spiritualism, as published by its best representatives, are as high and fine as you can find connected with any religion on the face of the earth." Does not this quotation show study and research?

Nellie Temple Brigham is on her way to Australia, where she will speak in many of the large cities of that country during the summer and fall. It is expected she will return to her own society about Thanksgiving time.

Rev. Minot J. Savage preaches his last sermon for the season on Sunday, June 29, then will depart for his vacation, which he so well deserves after his hard Winter's work. Dr. Savage in a recent sermon said the following beautiful lines:

"As spring recurs year by year, the first impression it creates in me is always of its beauty. How fair the new, soft look in the sky, the touch of green that begins to show itself on the far-off hilltops, that little misty cloud of light and color the trees make against the blue, the beauty of the grasses as they appear wherever there is a place for a blade to grow. These common grass blades are much more important to the beauty of the world than the roses and the orchids, and something might be made of this thought if there were time.

"On a certain occasion, looking upon something that suddenly touched him very much indeed, it is said that Lowell exclaimed, 'What a poet God is.' So we may say, what a lover of beauty God is, what a music lover God is, what an artist God is. How delicately he paints the leaf of the plant.

"Gray has told us, and we accept to take these sayings of the poet as very true,

'Full many a gem of purest ray serene,
The dark unfathomed caves of ocean bear,
Full many a flower is born to blush unseen
And waste its sweetness on the desert air.'"

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

Notes and Comments from the Pacific Coast.

More than anything else, have we been interested in the meat-makers' commotion in Chicago. The point seeming most worthy of attention is: how small a pebble is required to block the wheels of the largest enterprises. A hundred or two teamsters stop work, and at once thousands of people are thrown out of the opportunity to earn their daily bread. As we meditate upon this, a new idea flashes into the mental horizon. Is this not the subtile planning of the captains of labor, to make a fight for new advantages to labor, where the fewest men could do the most efficient work in the stoppage of the industrial wheels. We must grant the fact of these leaders being able to use their experience and be competent to create new situations, or they would not be able to hold the positions they occupy amongst their fellows. But it is a new way of playing an old game. Thus far, it has been an undoubted success.

The witches' cauldron of politics is boiling and bubbling in this state and city, with the contention of clashing, selfish interests and the intense desire of the outs to become ins. The usual means of party machinery is put in operation to bring about two sets of conditions intended to occupy the same place at the same time. As this is a known impossibility, the spoils are divided on the white man's plan, who went hunting with one of the red children of the forest. They agreed to divide the game equally. They shot a turkey and a turkey buzzard. In dividing, the white man said: "I'll take the turkey and you take the buzzard; or you take the buzzard and I'll take the turkey." The Indian's quick reply: "You no say turkey for me one time." The white man's gun prevented further argument. The story is clear as applying to politics, and indicates the resting place of the spoils.

The expected Mystic Shriners, clad in festive costumes, have begun to arrive. The telegraph has announced that many more are on the way. Already we hear the voice of that red-skinned, Chinese abomination, the fire-cracker, as it is manipulated by the small boy who is the grand high-priest of Noise. Elaborate preparations are being made for the public program of their week in San Francisco.

We hear the locust plague is falling heavily on some of our southern counties, where high hopes of large crops had been held. The event is all after one fashion: green fields—a winged cloud—brown branches and desolation. It is stated that some years ago when this plague had begun to formulate in Utah, an army of sea-gulls appeared, where previously none had been known. They devoured the locusts and rested from their labors on Salt Lake, where they are now safe from injury in the gratitude of this generation. The incident classes with the Egyptian miracles of Moses. Can anybody tell us the why?

The proposition in The Progressive Thinker, for the sustaining of the Medium's Home at Reed City, Mich., is certainly a most laudable and feasible one. One dollar a year, less than two cents a week. There is not a Spiritualist in the United States that could not save that. At the very least, 25,000 Spiritualists ought to respond to the call for help. I like the way the proposition is put, for it makes the hearts of the subscribers to this constant fund, the treasury of the enterprise. How many will do this? There is a great deal of talk now-a-days about organization, if we would only organize! But an organization without money is in as bad a fix as a tramping hobo. The concentration of organization is the beginning of active work. But it is like the body, useless without vital action. The vital fluid of all financial success is money. We ought to accept these terms, for it is seldom we get anything so cheap. One dollar, every twelve months. Let us jump at the chance to give some of our dear mediums a place of shelter, when they are no longer able to do for themselves. Remember Dean Swift's charity sermon. Text: He who giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord. Sermon: If you like the security, down with the dust.

To our disappointment, Nellie Brigham is not to lecture here as previously announced. She is to be in our city but three days. Her time is limited by the date of the sailing of the Australian steamer. The cause of our disappointment will only increase the joy of those to whom she goes, as they will see her all the more quickly.

Anna L. Gillespie has gone East to fill her summer's engagements at the various camps. We are not informed whether her itinerary takes her through Chicago or not.

We understand that Mrs. E. B. Marcen has an engagement to speak for the Spiritual Union in San Jose during the summer. She is a strong and able speaker and is capable of working much good for the cause.

The usual changes of vacations and summer arrangements are taking place in the spiritual camps and stated places of meetings throughout our city. But rarely does a vacancy occur without a supply. W. P. PHELON, M. D.

THREE GREAT QUESTIONS.

Their Discussion Not Always Profitable.

Permit me as a laymun in the spiritual fold, and a reader of your incomparable paper, to make a few remarks in reference to the three questions uppermost in the minds of your many readers. The questions of Deity or no Deity, Education or no Education; and the seeming inharmony of good and evil side by side. We as Spiritualists having positive proof and knowledge of a future life, view with abhorrence and disgust the superstitions, bigotry, intolerance and false ideas taught by the adherents of the Christian and Pagan systems of religion.

The amount of energy and earthly treasure wasted in teaching and perpetuating these false systems of religion is appalling to us who view the same from the standpoint of the spiritual philosophy. If this misdirected energy and misapplied treasure were used in teaching the true philosophy of life, both here and in the spirit world, what an impetus it would give in elevating to a higher life all mankind.

It is proper for us Spiritualists to ask the question whether we are free from the errors and shortcomings of which we complain in our Christian and Pagan brethren. Are we not also superstitious, bigoted, egotistical and intolerant.

Do we teach by precept and example, the true philosophy of life?

Have we the whole truth and nothing but the truth?

When I read the pro's and con's on the question above referred to, in The Progressive Thinker from week to week, and note not only the direct antagonisms of the arguments, but also the unkind and unbrotherly personal allusions, I am not only amazed, but also ashamed, that we as Spiritualists are guilty of the same shortcomings and imperfections of which we complain in our orthodox brethren.

Viewed from the point of common sense the agitation of the God question is not only impracticable but also unprofitable.

The most exalted spirits from the highest spheres who ever communicated do not pretend to know anything about it. Then why should we in this lower life waste any time and energy in solving a question which the highest spirits have been unable to fathom.

Brother A. J. Davis infers from the geometrical construction of a flower, there is a God.

Brother J. S. Loveland, with equal force and logic, and from the same premises and arguments, infers there is no God.

To my limited understanding the question is unknown and unknowable, and we as true Spiritualists should not waste much time and energy in agitating a question which can in no sense be of any practicable or profitable value in making mankind either wiser or better.

I am also astonished that among us progressive Spiritualists there should be any difference of opinion in regard to the value of an education obtained from any source or anywhere. The acrimonious debate indulged in discussing this question by our intelligent and educated sister, Clara Watson, and our only and incomparable brother, Moses Hull, has demonstrated that in some respects we are not much ahead of our orthodox brethren. Sister Watson must surely be mistaken if she insists that spiritualistic mediums need no education only such as is imparted to them by decarnate spirits. If the worthy sister had no education, only such as she has received from the spirit spheres, she would not be the intelligent and educated person that she is.

Brother Hull knows that the education and knowledge received from the decarnate spirits, important as it is, would be comparatively of little value unless supplemented by all the knowledge and education obtainable in the present life. The knowledge, education and experiences obtained in the earth life are absolutely necessary as a foundation to build a progressive life upon in the spirit spheres. There should be no difference of opinion among Spiritualists on this subject.

So-called evil is as necessary in a progressive life as good, because we can only learn and enjoy the good in contrast and juxtaposition of its opposite evil. No man would know or enjoy the exquisite pleasure of eating a hearty meal if he had never been hungry. No man could enjoy the warmth of a cheerful fire if he had never been cold. No person would know or enjoy the satisfaction of being comfortably clothed and housed, if he had never been in rags or shelterless. No person could estimate the value of education if he had never experienced its opposite ignorance; and so on ad infinitum.

The truth in a nutshell can be summed up in the lines of the following stanza:

All nature is but art unknown to thee,
All chance direction which thou canst not see:
All discord harmony, not understood
All partial evil universal good.

SOME REFLECTIONS

On Hospitals, Christian and Non-Christian.

Rev. Mr. Clingan, of Quincy, Ill., on the occasion of presenting diplomas to Blessing Hospital graduates last Tuesday evening, stated that the hospital was the direct fruit of the works of Jesus Christ. The influence of Christ's example and teachings in promoting charity and humanity need not be disputed but we should recognize the fact that provision was made for the sick as well as for the poor before the days of the Nazarene reformer. Even in pagan antiquity there was enough of innate goodness in the human heart to lead men to feel sympathetic with and to provide relief for the unfortunate.

The hospital, as it has existed in Christendom, had its origin largely doubtless in the arrangements of Christian monasteries for the poor and sick, but in one form or another the hospital existed outside of Christendom and before the Christian era.

Prof. Monier Williams says that the first hospitals for diseased people of which we have any historic knowledge were established by the Buddhists of India, who also established similar institutions for dumb animals.

In the fourth century before Christ, we are told an edict was promulgated in India by King Azoka, commanding the establishment of hospitals throughout the dominions, and these hospitals are declared to have been flourishing in the fifth and in the seventh centuries.

Says an encyclopedia: "Bearing some resemblance to our present hospitals were the public buildings for the aged women of Delos, built on the island called Rhenea, and those buildings which at a later period were erected near the temple of Aesculapius for sick persons coming in search of health."

Among the ancient Mexicans there were hospitals in the principal cities. Referring to them, Prescott, says: "I must not omit to notice here an institution, which in the old world, is ranked among the beneficent fruits of Christianity. Hospitals were established in the principal cities for the cure of the sick and the permanent refuge of the disabled soldiers, and surgeons were placed over them, who were so far better than those in Europe," says an old chronicler, that they did not protract the cure in order to increase the pay." Prescott's "Conquest of Mexico," p. 57.

Bancroft, in "Native Races of the Pacific States," volume 2, page 396, says: "For several cases the expenses of treating, which could not be borne except by the wealthy classes, hospitals were established by the government in all the larger cities of Mexico, endowed with ample revenues, where patients from the surrounding country were cared for by experienced doctors, surgeons and nurses, well versed in all the healing arts."

Insane asylums were founded by Mohammedans before any had been established in Christendom. Lecky, the historian, tells us that "the first Christian asylum for the insane was established at Valencia, Spain, in 1409, 700 years after the first one was erected by the Mohammedans."

Says R. Bosworth Smith in his Mohammed and Mohammedanism, "No Christian need be sorry to learn, or be backward to acknowledge, that, contrary to what is usually supposed, two of those noble institutions (hospitals and lunatic asylums) which flourish now most in Christian countries, owe their origin and their early spread, not to his own religion, but to the great heart of humanity which beats in two other of the grandest religions of the world." (Buddhism and Mohammedanism.)

There was a military hospital in Ireland, we read, 300 years before the Christian era.

The Romans had a medical staff in their army and must of course have had provisions for the sick and wounded of their armies.

The Jews and Saracens had medical schools maintained in connection with each other in some countries. The institution was known as the Asclepious. It combined a hospital and a medical school.

Draper, in the "Intellectual development of Europe," volume one, page 386, says: "The destruction of the Asclepious was not attended by any suitable extensive measures for insuring professional education. The sick who were placed in the benevolent institutions were at best rather under the care of kind nurses than under the advice of physicians; and the consequences are seen in the gradually increasing credulity and imposture of succeeding ages, until, at length, there was an almost universal reliance on miraculous interventions."

Ancient Egyptians had a college of physicians paid by the public, and their practice was regulated by law. In Egypt, centuries before the Christian era, there were many dispensaries, "where," according to a writer who has studied the subject, "the poor repaired to be treated of their diseases."

It would seem that hospitals and institutions of charity have been confined exclusively to no age or nation. They are the natural outcome of that compassion for suffering humanity which is a mark of all civilizations, ancient and modern. The same spirit that has caused communities recently to help the people of Martinique also impelled the ancients to send supplies to cities that were wrecked by earthquakes and impelled Rome to send grain to starving districts from the granaries of the empire. It remained for benevolence however to be exhibited in the most helpful organizations in this practical scientific age.

PHENOMENAL.

Spirit Paintings Produced in Broad Daylight.

I have been a Spiritualist for over ten years, and have investigated the phenomena in nearly all its phases, but I had never before seen that which I will try to describe. I live about twenty miles from Baker City, Ore. Last Saturday I went there, and came home the next Monday. I attended two Spiritual meetings while there; one on Centre street, and the other at the parlors of Mr. and Mrs. McClelland, 1301 Third street, where there were between thirty and forty sitters, and while the seance was very good, it is not the one of which I wish to speak.

At the residence of Mr. and Mrs. McClelland is living a man and his wife, Mr. and Mrs. G. L. Colby. Mr. Colby is gifted with the power of having spirit pictures appear on newspapers while reading the same; but the best part is that he will sit, stand or walk about the room, and in broad daylight have pictures appear on canvas after having it prepared by stretching it in a frame and setting it in a window. The pictures seem to appear, and you can see the work going on all the time, no matter whether he is looking or not. All that seems to be required he must be somewhere in the room.

The pictures represent spirits, and the greater part of them seem to be Orientals, with peculiar head-dress or otherwise. He tells me he has never seen anyone whom he knew. He also tells me that he gave up the sittings for a while for the reason that such a large number would try to get their pictures all on the canvas at once, and would be drawn so promiscuously that the lines would interfere with each other; but since he has commenced lately they have been a little more systematic. Some of the pieces are not larger than a half dollar, while others are life size. A picture will appear right before one's eyes, and will develop while one is looking at the process. Now, when we take the canvas down away from the light, or so the light does not show through, we can see nothing from either side but the white canvas, so that it looks as though it was drawn through the center or between the front and back of the canvas, and is only seen by holding it up to the light.

I have seen spirit paintings and spirit photos, but nothing like the above. Mr. Colby tells me that he has no idea what is coming on the canvas while he is in the room, and he may be talking to others all the time, which would show that it is not by or through any suggestion of his.

Mr. Colby is a large, fleshy, good-natured man, of about fifty-five or sixty years old; is not much of a talker, and says but little of his wonderful powers. Now, if you or any of your readers wish for a more full account, Mr. Colby, who resides at 1391 Third street, Baker City, Oregon, will answer all questions that may be asked him in writing, by sending stamps; or, if anyone coming through Baker City would call on him, they can see such things for themselves. Mr. Colby is a laboring man, working for the Oregon Lumber Company at Baker City. A. L. SNELL.

THE WINNER OVER THERE.

While humanity is racing to get money foul or fair,
While men scramble, push and hustle
Through this life of bone and muscle
I oft wonder who the winner of the laurels will be there.
Over there, over there,
I wonder who'll be winner over there.

Some are thriving, some are starving in this world of do and dare,
Some are rising, some are falling
With alacrity appalling,
And I wonder who the winner and the loser will be there.
Over there, over there,
Who the winner and the loser over
there.

Will it be the greedy grabber of a multimillionaire
Or will it be true merit
The kingdom will inherit.
Then the one they call the sinner may be winner over there.
Over there, over there,
Then the sinner may be winner over
there.

If the just shall be rewarded and the unjust treated fair;
If to wisdom all is trusted
All this strife will be adjusted
In an equitable manner in the future over there.
Over there, over there,
In an equitable manner over there.

DR. T. WILKINS.

IN FUTURO.

Better days are coming bye and bye,
Dear heart.
When oppression's cruel hand
Has been banished from the land,
Then old wrongs shall pass away,
Truth and Justice have full sway—
In the better days bye and bye.

Brighter days are coming bye and bye,
Dear heart.
Hear ye not that glad refrain,
"Peace on earth, good will to men?"
Then the Golden Rule shall be Lived by all humanity
In the brighter days bye and bye.

Sweeter days are coming bye and bye,
Dear heart.
Would I now could ease thy pain,
Bring to thee, dear, peace again,
But thy tears shall cease to flow,
Joy and gladness thou wilt know
In the sweeter days bye and bye.

Restful days are coming bye and bye,
Dear heart.
When the tired, weary soul
Shall have reached the final goal—
Leaving earthly cares and strife,
Passing to the higher life,
In the restful days bye and bye.

SABBATH DESECRATION.

The First Baptist Church of Elkhart, Ind., Rebuked.

The First Baptist Church of Elkhart, Ind., petitioned the Honorable Board of Park Commission to prevent the sale of refreshments, etc., at Island Park, believing the same contrary to law and a desecration of the Sabbath. Below we give a characteristic reply of the Park Commissioners. It is spicy, and shows that intolerance is gradually losing its grip:

To the Members of the First Baptist Church, City:

Ladies and Gentlemen:—Your communication of the 3rd containing copy of your action taken by you on Sunday, June 1, in refence to the sale of refreshments on Island Park on Sundays and signed by the following list of ministers: Wm. Frazer, Somerville Light, S. Clarke, M. W. Sunderland, H. F. Schwarzkoff, Herman Lind, C. E. Rice, J. O. Mosier, A. U. Ogilvie, Wm. Galpin and Edward H. Emett, came duly to hand and was carefully considered. In reply thereto we will state that section 2080 of the Statute of Indiana, which you quote, contains "works of charity and necessity only excepted," which we interpret differently, and have acted in accordance with our interpretation of said law. We believe refreshments of the kind sold on Island Park are necessities in every sense of the word and are universally recognized as such, and are partaken of by all classes of people at any time the desire prompts them. In fact, the custom has been so long established that those engaged in catering to the wants of mankind are required by the existing customs to arrange their business hours in such a manner as will enable them to properly cater to the wants of the people. And custom, good wholesome custom, such as a vast majority of the people indulge in and approve of has always been, we believe, and always will be, the underlying basis from which all laws pertaining to their welfare, comfort and happiness have their origin.

Your next statement: "That persons engaged in catering to the wants of the people disturb the rest and quietude of the public and their enjoyment of Island Park," we do not agree with for the reason that the lease of F. S. Timmins contains the following clause therein: "The method of said business to be under rules and regulation of the Board of Park Commissioners," and the superintendent of Island Park, Andrew Zigler, has been instructed fully in regard to his duties and has always performed them to the letter. Inasmuch as you have brought up the question of rest and quietude, we will state for the benefit of the Baptist church that the only row that ever took place on Island Park during the past two years that the board has any knowledge of, and which is recorded, was started and carried on most vociferously by the pastor of your church, Rev. Edward H. Emett, on the day that his Sunday-School held a picnic. In fact, his manner was so aggressive and offensive that Superintendent Andrew Zigler was compelled to rebuke him by saying: "Now, my dear sir, please be quiet; the Good Book does not teach people to act as you are acting, and if you will just be patient for a few minutes I shall arrange matters satisfactorily," and this was done. The cause of the disturbance was due to an oversight on the part of the secretary of the Park Board, giving a written permission to his Sunday-School and then forgetting to notify the superintendent of the park, who had given a similar privilege to the Riverside Sunday-School. The latter arrived at the Island first and took possession of the dining hall, and when your Mr. Emett and Sunday-School arrived he began in his characteristic but unprofessional manner to demand what he considered his rights, and after an understanding had been arrived at the Riverside party cheerfully vacated the dining hall and were provided with tables under the trees.

The foregoing is the only knowledge the Commissioners have concerning the matter excepting that your Mr. Goldthwaite did complain to Mr. A. M. Bickel, president of the Park Board, and was by him invited to put his complaint in writing or to have interested or injured parties come before the board and make their statement. Neither of these courses, however, were followed, and your Mr. Emett is and was personally acquainted with the secretary of the Park Board, Mr. James A. Bell, and met him frequently after said picnic but never referred to the matter. But we did hear indirectly through some members of the Common Council that considerable complaint had been made to them, and we can but believe that your Mr. Emett is very erratic and overly supplied with superfluous energy and lacks the right sort of opportunities for working it up. Furthermore, we can see no "moral fitness or propriety" in his deportment or action; on the contrary we are inclined to believe that if some arrangement were made whereby he could be put at manual labor in some one of our factories for six (6) days every week of ten (10) hours or more each day, that when Sunday arrived his views on "moral fitness and propriety," and "rest and quietude," would be materially changed. We believe also that the pernicious activity he has displayed in this matter will do the cause of Christianity more harm than good, because during the past two years there have been at least 5,000 people at the Sunday concerts on Island Park, every one of them liberty-loving, law-abiding, self-respecting, and respected people, and all of them capable of determining for themselves the "moral fitness and propriety" of purchasing such refreshments as are sold on Island Park either on Sunday or any other day, as the history of the Island prior to and since the commencement of the Sunday concerts is overwhelmingly convincing to any unbiased mind, when the fact is considered that there never has been nor was occasion for arresting any person for misdemeanor of any kind or even ordering anyone out of the park.

Therefore, ladies and gentlemen of the First Baptist church, and also reverend gentlemen, signers of the petition, we, the Board of Park Commissioners, exercising the authority vested in us, do respectfully decline to grant your petition, and our reasons for such action are based on the grounds as set forth in the foregoing, and the further fact that we believe your view of the situation to be injudicious and unwarranted for the following reasons: You gentlemen of the ministry are no doubt acting by pure motives, and well qualified to expound theology to your congregations, but your circumstances and method of gaining a livlihood are entirely different from that of the masses, who have to work long hours, six days each week, and the interval between is largely consumed in rest and recuperation. Sunday arrives each week and is a day set apart and the manner of spending the day is a matter that concerns each individual only, providing his manner of doing it does not interfere with the happiness or comfort of any other person.

We are well aware that law can be cited to show that people shall not do this or that on Sunday, but we all know they do pretty much as they please within the law, and all public officials engaged in the making and enforcement of law recognize the limitations and complex problems connected therewith, and aim to so make and enforce them as to please the majority of the people whose servants they are. You know we all need wholesome diversion of some kind, and it is well known that the working people have very little time during the week, consequently a vast number of them secure their needed diversion and pleasure on Sunday, each according to his individual taste and circumstances. The financial condition of many is such that they cannot afford what others indulge in during the week, and we believe that these conditions largely influenced the establishing of public parks, and the aim of the present Board of Commissioners has always been to provide for the most wholesome accommodations and attractions on Island Park that the money provided by the tax levy would permit. With this end in view it was deemed advisable to construct two additional buildings on Island Park, one a refreshment stand and the other a band stand, the revenue from the former to be applied on the cost for the services of the band. We believe that in doing our work in the above described and in other ways too numerous to mention, we have done our full duty, and we feel confident that our work meets with the approval of almost the entire community. Some of you may say, we are not opposed to band concerts but we are opposed to the sale of refreshments, but the clamor raised last winter with the manager of the Opera House in reference to those concerts indicates the contrary, and our candid opinion is that you are opposed to band concerts on Sunday and not the least bit opposed to the sale of refreshments, as some of you have been seen enjoying them on Sunday the same as other people. Then there is another phase of this matter we desire to dwell on to justify and convince the reverend gentlemen on the statement we have made herein, and that is their perverted view point and the cause underlying the same. Their labor is practically all done on Sunday in conducting services etc., and during the week there are many days from which they can select one to enjoy a holiday suitable to their desires. Some of them like to go fishing, others enjoy a buggy or bicycle ride in the country, and thus in these and various other ways, they are able to get the diversion so necessary to retain their health and vigor, thus enabling them to perform the duties devolving upon them.

Volumes of space could be used in discussing this subject, but we believe that until the law of evolution, assisted by scientists, philosophers and theologians, change conditions throughout the world, all the people will spend their Sundays in a manner that to them seems best, and secures to them the diversion they desire within the law.

Respectfully yours,

Board of Park Commissioners,
A. M. BICKEL, President;
WM. SEIDEL, Vice-Pres.;
J. A. BELL, Sec'y and Treas.

THANKS TO THE PRESBYTERIAN COUNCIL.

Let's hold a mothers' jubilee!
Since all our babies are set free
From hades, by a wise decree
Of Presbyterian Council!

All hail! the prattling cherub throng;
With forms, "not even a span long;"
Now marching up to heaven, strong;
Released, by that same Council!

Sweet little babes! how pleased they are;
To join their Christian mammas there,
And rest in heavenly mansions fair,
Through kindness of that Council!

Their Heavenly Father bids them "come,"
And welcomes these sweet culprits home,
Who have escaped "eternal doom"
By Presbyterian Council!

Kind Jesus folds them to his breast
And soothes these "little ones" to rest,
While "giving thanks" with fervent zest
To Presbyterian Council,

For favors he did not expect,
To infant sinners, "non-elect;"
However, he will not reject
The wisdom of that Council!

Rejoice, ye mothers, now be glad;
No longer let your hearts be sad;
Your babes in angel robes are clad
By Presbyterian Council!

Saint Peter's agent, too, is "free"—
The Roman pontiff; "Holy See!"
By that "Divine authority,"
The Presbyterian Council!

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM.

It Embraces Whatever is Worthy in Every System.

NUMBER FIVE.

The philosophy of Spiritualism first and foremost recognizes the truth of that assertion made by "the angel Jesus sent" to John in Patmos—that "Mystery is the mother of all abominations" (Rev.)—So instead of mystifying in order to rule the Spiritualist must act on the principle that regarding this world or that language was invented not to conceal but to express thought and while it is not always expedient or edifying to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth to people afraid of it, prejudiced and used to taking it in a mixed alloyed diluted form so far as admissible, he must try to say what he means.

When therefore he says in the words of one who knew it long ago that "there is a spiritual body," he only repeats what the orthodox never refused to repeat, but differs in that he means it. A body that has reality, substantiality, objectivity—a body that has size, form, color, weight, although lighter than our atmosphere perhaps; a body that has organs with functions to perform; a body that has all the important qualities of the physical body but composed of a finer substance, so refined that your coarse instruments cannot weigh it nor the nervous system of a "non-sensitive" so embedded and enmeshed in the flesh respond to the delicate sensations of seeing, hearing, or feeling its proximity, Spiritualism says that the "things" of the spirit worlds have a reality or substantiality appreciable by the senses of the spiritual body as truly and more vividly than the grossest matter of this world has a reality appreciable by the senses of the physical body; that as it is by contact through the organs of sensation in the physical body you awaken to a consciousness of the terrestrial world and life so is it by contact through the organs of sensation in the spiritual body, that spirits arrive at an intelligent consciousness of any spirit world and life. Spiritualism says that nature abhors a vacuum and that—well we shall not say matter, but substance in varying degrees of density—in the various states of motion, pervades the boundless universe—the higher and lower spirit zones differing thus in degrees of density. Spiritualism teaches that the laws which govern manifestations of energy through matter here are universal laws and govern manifestations of energy through the finer substance of any spirit realm; being rougher, stormier, more violent in action and reaction generally, as the substance is dense or coarse. So you may expect upon awaking to a clear consciousness of your spirit home, that so far as nature is concerned she manifests in more symmetrical forms, melodious sounds, delicate colors, fragrant odors and delicious tastes—that the "unseen things of God are made known by the visible things." (This passage may be interpreted otherwise, but it also fits here.)

Spiritualism teaches that within you now, permeating the physical, is the spiritual substance of which that body is composed, and at death good clairvoyants see the separation take place—the spiritual body assuming generally the shape of the physical body. Now this physical instrument, as you know, responds under adverse conditions in a degree to the will, the form and features reflecting the ideal or dominating aspiration; or, at the worst, indicating to a sharp observer what the man or woman would like to be. Immeasurably better does the plastic, flexible, spiritual instrument respond, and the person who cherished faithfully here the ideal of gentleness, nobility, youth, beauty, even if the physical, but dimly reflected that ideal will, to the angels appear as they spiritually are—beautiful and noble. This explains why the angels sometimes love most dearly those whom people that see only flesh despise. In the physical body beauty may to an extent be "skin-deep," but in the spiritual body so responsive to the will, it is as deep as the fondest aspiration is high. The spiritual face is no mask.

If your eyes were on the X-ray principle, in looking at me you would most clearly see my skeleton—the flesh being dim and hazy. Different yet comparable, spirits unless materializing to a sufficient degree see clearly only my spiritual body—the flesh and bones being dim and cloudy or shadow-like. Now primarily spiritual development is equivalent to properly nourishing and exercising this spiritual body which you now possess.

Behold the lilies of the field; they toil not neither do they spin but they transform the black and shapeless mud into forms the most beautiful, and colors the most exquisite and gorgeous. In all that may be said about spirit return and life in the spirit realms there is told no miracle to equal this. Consider how the cow, the pig and the goose eat the same grass or grain, one transforming it into hair of a certain color, another into hair of another color, and the third into feathers of another hue. So by a subtle alchemy does the spiritual-minded person transform the finer elements of food into the substance of a spiritual body—there being a great truth poorly reflected in the heathen custom of feasting at funerals and burying choice morsels in order to nourish the spirit on its journey. The Chinese leave choice viands on the grave for a little, in order, as they explain, that the spirit may extract the spiritual elements of that food. In all such customs is dimly reflected the same truth I point out, and the one that underlies the custom of grace before meat—that underlies the dogma of transubstantiation—the sacrament of the Lord's Supper.

All ceremonies have been more or less wisely instituted to impress the mind, stimulate the imagination, direct the will, with a view to this transformation; and our old earth is not dying any more than we, but through countless agencies is continually being refined and giving off the finer elements of which the spirit realms surrounding us are composed. For there is no arbitrary dividing line in nature between the physical and spiritual realms, any more than between a temperate and tropical zone. To-day the scientist with his finest appliances is touching on the spiritual—associating with and inspired by his comrades and teachers "over there," who with their spiritual heads and hands conceive and construct implements to experiment with natural phenomena on their plane, as we do on this one. Your scientist to-day finds it necessary to predicate the existence of agencies—of real substances which his implements cannot weigh or measure, nor unless medium-istic can he see, hear or feel; for instance, personal magnetism and the dog who follows the scent of my emanations along a path where a hundred feet have trod and leaves it where I turned out twenty hours ago, should have taught us long ago not to deny the existence of substances—of worlds which our physical senses are not yet qualified to deal with. And if you will not learn from the dog this lesson of humility, go lower yet and learn it from the telescope and microscope.

That without extraordinary excitement or fear you are now much interested in Spiritualism is "presumptive proof" that the spiritual within you is pressing upon the fleshly restraints, trying to break its fetters; that you are already in possession of an organism which, emancipated from physical restraints, will enable you in an important degree to realize the finer sensations of a decarnate life; that you do not need to return into the dust and mud and fogs of this world (although not so spiritual but you can be benefited by occasionally associating with congenial mortals) but will find a world you can appreciate far better; the spirit realms one and all being duplicates, finished, polished and refined copies of this world, differing essentially in degrees of refinement. So with an orderly imagination chastened by reason, qualified by such facts as you may gather, you can paint a picture, rough but reliable, of your spirit abode. The most delectable sensations you now get are due to action of spirit influences upon the spiritual organism.

NUMBER SIX.

We can every one to a large degree be his own philosopher. As a scientist picking up here and there the bones of a prehistoric animal, fits them together and constructs the image of that animal, so can you by associating the disconnected facts and varying revelations of common mediums, formulate a rational philosophy of Spiritualism. In this most significant of all facts—the one of continued mentality; of known mental processes; of the persistence of a nature like your own in your spirit visitors, you have the whole backbone of your skeleton—the basic fact upon which must rest any sound philosophy or creditable revelation. Upon this rock must be built every reasonable conjecture, every sane dogma, all sustaining faith, hope and love. This is the "Rock of Ages," and building on it "the heathen groping blindly in the darkness touches God's hand in that darkness." With this fact so well established—practically sustained by all mediumship past and present, even if a spirit would try to deny it he could not do so intelligently without betraying it) you will not be afraid to assume broadly "as on earth, so in the skies;" to infer that the conditions which sustain are not fundamentally at variance with the conditions that for untold ages have been persistently fashioning this human nature but must generally correspond to perpetuate with the conditions that evolved it. If there be anywhere spirits who do not manifest this human nature, there is between us and them the impassable gulf.

So far I have assumed that spirits really do communicate with mortals. In America to-day it is a question of fact rather than argument, for in almost every community if you use equal diligence in the inquiry as you do to learn where they sell the most sugar for a dollar or to find where they sell whiskey in a prohibition town, you will discover facts that fit into no other theory. In the strictest sense you can only know and be free from doubt regarding what you have seen, felt, heard, and you will by inquiry find more convincing proof of this than of the statement that Boers live in South Africa, for that you take on the testimony of other men. And putting the question of spirit communication on the same basis of testimony, upon no question other than that of the possibility of mortal communicating with mortal has testimony been so overwhelming. Ever since the human race advanced to record in writing, or hieroglyphics, or hand down traditionally their convictions, all races and conditions of men practically have agreed on the general proposition and "believe in the communion of saints." To me it seems a far less wonderful thing that a spirit should come back, than that they came here the first time. Spirit return is nothing like the wonder that the birth of a child is. "Why should it seem to you a marvelous thing that one rose from the dead?"

A New System of Medicine.

The practice of Biochemistry is the most advanced science in medicine.

The renowned Dr. Schuesler, of Germany, has discovered a new system for the practice of medicine by supplying the deficient natural cell-salts in the blood.

If skilfully chosen, these chemical salts, which are called the Tissue remedies, reach each diseased organ or tissue, and speedily restore it to its natural healthy condition.

There is no poison or narcotic in these delicate but powerful remedies. The system must retain its full complement of these chemical constituents to maintain perfect health.

We are able to select with fine accuracy the proper remedy each particular disease demands.

Every element required for sustaining the body in a state of health is contained in the food we eat, the water we drink, and the air we breathe. Therefore a frequent change of diet and residence is often required.

Science has not reached its zenith of perfection in prescribing a perfect regime of diet to nourish the body and provide a proper ratio of these elements nature requires. Every known disease can be cured by the application of these chemical agents.

There would be no premature gray hair, no bald heads or defective teeth, no cancers, nor other deadly disease, were there no deficiency in these cell-salts in the blood. Small-pox and other contagious diseases could not be contracted, if the system was fortified by the required elements.

Microscopy reveals both red and white corpuscles in the blood. The red ones (amoeba) are alive and active; the white corpuscles are dead. The red ones must far outnumber the white for normal blood, or the patient will exhibit a pallor of the skin, a leading symptom.

Now the Biochemic system of practice aids nature by supplying these amoeba with proper food for carrying on their work.

A medical student, before being vaccinated, had his blood corpuscles counted, and then again afterward, which revealed the fact of a visible diminution of red corpuscles and a corresponding increase of white ones, demonstrating the effect the vaccine virus had on the blood.

Every disease is due to the lack of one or more salts. Every pain or unpleasant sensation indicates a lack of some constituent of the blood.

The great secret of combating disease is to strictly adhere to nature's divine law, and aid her by supplying the deficient tissue remedy.

THE HIDDEN LIGHT.

Delving into the Mysteries of Human Nature.

Life is the soul of things. Light is the soul of life. The mystic doctrine of the microcosm or "world in little," is too refined, too subtle, as some think, for such times as these. The disposition is to simplify—to get, rather, hard clearness and superficial consistency than the hidden secret of the inner life of things.

In our days it is customary to take a more superficial view of man, as a creature of organization or of circumstances; a mass of partially animated clay; a product of brute force, that here and there crops out in forms of intelligence. Like the coral reef he is supposed to bloom faintly at the top—all beneath being dead limestone.

The psychologist burrows deep to discover the roots of mind, and works at last in a region "where the light is as darkness." At times in his doctrine of evolution, making the latest comer the heir of all the bestiality that has gone before, he seems about to reproduce the doctrine of the microcosm; a little more feeling mixed with his investigations would class him among the mystics.

The latest words of the psychologist—such men as Wm. James, E. B. Titchener, R. P. Halleck, and others—go far to throw a flood of light upon this doctrine so long neglected, on account of its mystic implications. So it comes about that the first shall be last and the last first. For many theories are called, but few are chosen.

Let us note some of the forms in which this hidden life is demonstrable with us; day by day, although unrecognized, it is present as the "Unseen Real," as Theodore Parker sang it:

"Yes, I am nearer thee! Though still unseen,
Thy presence fills my life's diviner part.
Now that no earthly shadows intervene,
I feel a deeper sense of what thou art."

There is a hidden life of organization which is familiar to all. It is simply true that our physical constitution is the result of innumerable influences, near or remote, that deposit themselves in the blood, bones, tissues, nerves, and act there beyond the reach of our will. If you ever observed a child, in its infancy, you have noticed the ceaseless activity of its waking hours; the experiments it makes at seeing, hearing, feeling, moving; the slowness with which it comes to the use of its senses, as if it was practicing the rudiments of existence for the first time.

The experiments finished, the results remain. They deposit themselves in the system as a permanent possession. The child uses them, but thinks of them no more. His conscious life is, perhaps, on the surface, idle, thoughtless, passionate. Yet beneath it all the powers acquired in infancy go on silently, never slumbering or sleeping, working while he rests, active while he sleeps, still renewing what he wastes.

The physical functions are automatic. The digestion of food is accomplished by a series of intricate processes which only experts pretend to understand, and which they could not reproduce by any mechanism of their own. Yet on the fidelity of these unwatched functions, the mere thought of which makes us marvel that we live at all, our daily existence depends.

As the poet, George Hubert, expresses it,

"Man is all symmetry,
Full of proportions, one thing to another,
And all to all the world besides;
Each part may call the farthest brother,
For head with foot hath private amity
And both with moons and tides.
Nothing hath got so far
But man hath caught and kept it as his prey.
His eyes dismount the highest star,
He is the little all the sphere;
Herbs gladly cure our flesh, because that they Find their acquaintance there."

Really, the heaviest portion of all our mental labor is done for us by the power that is stored up in its living battery. We study, ponder, speculate, arrange, but the intelligence that solves the problem at last, lies below our thinking. After the student lays the matter down, goes off to something else, falls asleep, perhaps, and on returning finds the difficulty solved by the latent intelligence of whose activities he was unaware.

This fact of common observation gives rise to theories of "unconscious cerebration," and of the "double" and the "subconscious personality," and the "Inner Life." Do these explain? The facts remain. It reminds us of the discussion as to who wrote Homer's Iliad. After many years of "erudition" they decided that it was certainly another man of the same name.

Mathematicians have been known to wake in the morning holding the clue they had been groping after the whole preceding day.

Poets have received from the invisible spirits that dwelt either within or without the recesses of their brain, conceptions of beauty and of truth which they despaired of conjuring up by an effort of the imagination. This is one of the unsounded mysteries. Psychologists say they are on the track of it. Some are confident and full of plausible theories, but the humbler are only hopeful that one day it may be divulged.

Passing from this hidden life of organization, we come upon a life of experience which also has its mystery.

As organic power is accumulated, so are thought and sentiment accumulated from the inner depths of life. They are seemingly attracted from the unseen, and even unsuspected Light of Life. The sentimental nature is below the reach of the will, or perhaps above it.

Our loves and our hates, our sympathies and our antipathies, our drifts of emotion, our set of tendency, our humors, moods, dispositions are engendered in spiritual recesses or combinations we never think of exploring, never suspect of being there to be explored.

Out of these abysses come dark shadows that steal over the mind; glooms of fear, despondency, despair, that spread their pall over existence, shutting out the sun, and the songs of hope; turning all bright things and beings to ghastly black; shapes of terror and spells of oppression we cannot throw off, mists from the unseen ocean of life driving in upon us and choking our hearts.

Every day of domestic life leaves its layer of impressions on us as imperceptibly as the snow-flakes gather on the winter meadows, or the forest leaves cover the ground with materials for new soil. It is simply impossible that people should remain unaffected by what they pass through. Joys and sorrows, failures and successes, pains and pleasures, meetings and partings, experiences great and small insensibly do their part in making us interiorly what we are.

We may not know it, but we are different people when we come out of a long or severe trial, from what we were when we went into it. None but keen eyes may see the difference, but there is a great difference. We are sometimes metamorphosed by griefs.

We may be unconscious ourselves of the change—of course we are, for consciousness is only of the present moment. The "Eternal now" is with us all, for a season, in this earthly life, if we would but improve the moment. See Emerson's Gift of "Days" and learn that lesson.

I do not say that we are wiser or better, sweeter or larger, but we are not the same. We may be worse—more loose, more chaotic, more capacious waste-baskets, more plethoric rag-bags; but we are not the same.

Oftener, let us hope, a hidden light of life has been formed which may be quite at variance with the revealed life and yet may be more earnest, more genuine, more truly worthy to be called ourself—a life that makes its character felt, possibly, in unrest, disturbance, fretfulness and discontent because the common, conscious life is out of accord with it.

Below this deep experience, or through some rift above it, opens the light of character, more impressive, more solemn. It is the educated will of the aspiring soul!

This is not some idle, loose accumulation; it is the result of steady thinking, purposing, resolving and doing. It is this hidden Light that we see in the reformer, the revolutionist, who by a deep necessity, a moral fatality, consecrates himself to a cause, as Garibaldi for Italian freedom, not choosing it so much as being chosen for it by the powers above.

It is this that we see in the philanthropist like John Howard; who gives himself to his fellow men, as John G. Whittier gave himself to the cause of the slave.

It is this nobler, inner life that makes the true gentleman or lady do beautiful things by instinct, avoiding things ungracious and ignoble by an unerring sensibility that needs no admonition or prompting from rules of etiquette or maxims of prudence.

It looks as if that Great Central Mind of the Cosmic Life were psychologizing the world of man just sufficiently to awake their thought and bring their inner life to suspect the truth of that love and light beyond the other blue that attracts all those who are ready for the love-light to open up the secret depths of their emotional natures.

It is a satisfaction to know that the latest words of science tell us that their affirmations are rooted in an inner "something." We call it the living Light of the Oversoul.

According to Prof. Titchener, the given fact from which a theory of the universe must set out—is the concrete, individual human experience. (Being awakening in matter to the illusion of not-being, thence through evolution and progressive spiritualization "becoming" and moving onward to true being or manhood's spirit, in the Life of the Inner Light!)

This life of experience is at first neither spiritual nor material, subjective nor objective, neither experience of the self nor of the outer world. It is single and undifferentiated. By slow degrees it divides into halves, subject and object stand opposed to each other separately. The objective taking shape much more quickly than the subjective.

When the division has been completed and the man has reached a high stage of development, each half becomes the basis of a group of special sciences. The objective half is taken and worked upon the group of natural sciences, and the subjective half is worked up into the mental sciences. The former treat of experience abstractly as independent of the experiencer. The latter treat of it by a similar abstraction solely in its dependence upon the experiencer—or the individual being.

This is the situation which confronts the two philosophical disciplines. The theory of knowing on the one side and metaphysics on the other. It is the former's problem to explain how the concrete experience is originally fused in the one consciousness; how it has come to be divided up under an objective and a subjective aspect; what there is in the nature of truth to make this division necessary and helpful; and what measure of truth attaches to each side of the division at the present stage of thought.

It is the legitimate problem of metaphysics, which unifies and harmonizes the principles and laws of all the sciences, to take the conclusions reached by way of the two abstractions from experience, the conclusions of both the natural and the mental sciences and in their light to explain the given fact from which they are both derived; i. e., the concrete experience itself.

Is not this the grand synthesis in which both matter and quasi-spirit disappear in the unitary conception of Being or experience? The story of the soul as it is in God, the Central and Universal Being, in whom "we live and move and have our" experience.

It is of vast import to us to realize that we are eternal souls having bodies or ultimate expressions, and not bodies destitute of a central organizing life or principle. The real man is eternal in God, was never born and never dies. It eternally is of its own isness. A breath of the Eternal Consciousness. The mind and the gross body are continually changing, becoming, for created things exist through the law of change. But the soul attracts and builds the body, an attractive centre of a stream of matter, drawing the refined and the spiritualized to itself.

The truth and reality of this matter is peculiarly impressive. The springs of all living Faith are in it. The springs, I say, of Living Faith; not of any special kind or form of dogmatic faith, not of opinion either orthodox or heterodox, not of devotion or church piety, but of that moral conviction which gives assurance of the presence and ordering of a supreme will and mind. Faith in the validity of virtue; in the dignity of mind; in the supremacy of law, in the essential worth of Goodness, in the close connection of causes and effects; faith in the strong, steady, central hold of principles. This Faith has its living spring in the heights of the Living Light. And so:—

"My heart keeps singing this song of His love,
That Good is the Positive Power
And so many thoughts keep time with the tune
It seemingly brightens the hour.
And so I sing, and sing in my heart
Of Good and its love and power,
And it is to me in my daily walk
What the sunshine is to the flower."

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

THE SPIRIT PASSING OUT OF THE BODY.

An esteemed correspondent has sent us the following extract from a letter received from a friend, and which she thinks may be of interest to our readers. She has obtained her friend's consent to its publication:

I must try to tell you of a wonderful journey I had. It was about the seventh or eighth day of my illness; I was very weak and low, and the doctor had told Mr. Johnston that he was very anxious about me. That was in the morning. I was taking no nourishment except a little milk occasionally. In the evening nurse had gone out for an hour or two, and about eight o'clock Mr. Johnston, Bessie, and Acta were in the kitchen, having late tea. I had said they could leave me for a time, and I would knock if I wanted anything. I lay very still and quiet, in too much pain to move, when gradually there came a beautiful feeling of rest; but I was not sleeping. I then felt a sensation of gently sinking, sinking; then of being still for a moment, then going outwards; then gradually being enveloped in a grey mist, and I knew I was passing out of the body. This mist seemed an endless passage, about a yard in width, and on each side, so as to form as it were walls, were all kinds of machinery, from the first rude construction up to the present and latest inventions; and every conceivable kind of architecture, from huts formed of mud and stone up to mansions and palaces, but no vegetable matter; everything you can imagine that man can make. I had no sense of fear, only a feeling of novelty. I was traveling along this road so quickly, and it seemed hundreds and hundreds of miles long. I cannot explain clearly how I traveled. I neither walked nor floated. I simply seemed to travel by thought. I wished to go and I went. I was all the time conscious of a "presence" close to me, behind, as though guarding me. I was too interested for a long time with what I saw to want to know the meaning.

At last I asked the "presence," feeling that I should get an answer: "Where am I?" I did not hear, but felt, a voice in reply. The voice came from the "presence," saying: "This is the Valley of the Shadow of Death." I then asked the meaning of all these things that were ranged on each side, and the voice answered: "These are the shadows of things that were, things fashioned and formed by man." I asked: "Have I much farther to go, and what is beyond?" The answer came: "Look and see," and I looked forward. I had many miles to travel in the "Valley of Shadows," but space being no object to me, I could see beyond. How can I describe what I saw? It was a revelation of beauty. There were meadows carpeted with the softest of grass, like velvet, dotted with daisies and buttercups some of them, and some all green. I saw, also, the most exquisite flowers; fruit trees laden with ripe fruits; rocks, with the most wonderful grasses and heather growing on them; lovely rippling streams of purest water, and in the far distance a calm blue sea. And I had such a feeling of calm and peace that I thought of the text: "He leadeth me beside the still waters." I asked: "What is that place?"

The reply was: "That is the shadow of things that are, unspoiled by man." Then I questioned: "But what of man, and all the beauties and wonders of the animal kingdom? Where are they?" The reply was: "You will see them in the third stage later on; you must be thoroughly rested before you continue your journey so far." By this time I had come very near to the end of the "Valley of Shadows," and for the first time I thought of the earth and my duties there, and I said: "Oh, I must go back; my children and husband; what will they do without me?" The voice said: "Wait and consider; you must decide now. If you pass this Valley there is no going back, and if you go back there is much physical pain for you to endure. You can go on, if you like, to the perfect rest. I may not advise you." I felt tempted for just a moment to go on, for I thought: "Oh, to rest on those green fields!" Then I thought: "That is selfish; I must go back; duty calls me to the earth again." As soon as I had thus decided I felt myself going back again, the "presence" still following. I traveled very quickly to my starting point. I was standing outside the door, on the landing (we were living in a flat), when I thought: "I cannot pass through this door, I must knock." I willed to knock, and gave two loud raps on the door. I cannot remember how I got through the door, but was presently conscious of standing at the head of the bed, just behind the head of my body, and wondering how to get into my body again.

Now as to my husband and two girls; I told you they were in the kitchen. They had left me some time, and were sitting talking when my husband heard me call "Willie" (his name), and they all heard the two raps at the outer door. My husband said, "There is something wrong with ma." They came into my room, and I looked so strange that they thought I was passing away. The girls were crying. I felt this, and wanted to speak to them, but could not get control of my body. I can hardly explain what followed. I felt still the "presence" (I knew it was the same that was with me during the journey), forming, as it were, a link between my spirit and body. I felt conscious, too, of almost, but not quite, influencing my body; but the "presence" controlled and spoke to them, asking them to try to be passive, and saying that my spirit had almost gone to the other world, but I was making the effort to come back. It went on speaking in a strong, powerful, resonant voice, the voice of a man, and said: "Do not touch her body, but call her name three times and will her back; it is her desire to come." Willie then called, "Bessie, Bessie, Bessie!" I then made a frantic struggle and succeeded in getting back to my body; but, oh! the suffering that followed for weeks afterwards.

I have, as I told you, been chloroformed twice since then, but I am utterly unable to recall anything; it was a perfect blank to me each time. I remember the doctor telling me to count, and I kept counting for a few minutes; then total unconsciousness came until after the operation. Just before the doctor administered the chloroform I was very nervous, but the "presence" stood beside me, saying, "Have no fear; I will guard your body during the operation." The nurse, doctor, and Mr. Johnston (whom I wished to be present) told me afterwards that when I stopped counting for a minute, I began to speak in a strong, powerful voice (the same voice, Mr. Johnston says, that spoke before), and spoke for about ten minutes, giving some wonderful poetry. The same thing happened the next time I was chloroformed; still poetry, but addressed personally to the doctor.

BESSIE JOHNSTON.

CHILD CONTROLS.

Among the band of controls, or spirit guides, of professional mediums, there is generally a child control, usually the spirit of a little girl, who is sometimes an Indian or black child, and generally very vivacious and playful. Such are those bearing the names of Daisy, Frieda, Cissie, or Maudy; and although the manifestations in which they take part may continue during a space of many years, they always maintain their original personality, and never seem to grow any older. This fact is frequently commented upon with surprise, as we are always led to believe that those who die—or rather leave this world—as infants or little children, grow up to maturity in the spirit land. Dr. Paul Gibier's "Remarks on Maudy" seem to throw some light on this subject, and I will therefore translate the passage in which they occur. This is at the conclusion of his account of his experiments with Mrs. Salmon in New York; and my translation is from the German in "Psychische Studien" of September, and not from the original French.

Observations upon "Maudy."—She speaks only English. She says that some forty-five years ago while she was yet an infant in the cradle, she, and her whole family, were killed by Indians in the far West. Ten years ago I asked her how it was that, as it was so long ago since she had died, she did not look older. Her answer was that, in the first place, she had not died—she had only changed her condition; and that in the spirit-world development was not so rapid as in this. As since that time I have remarked no perceptible change in her form, manner, or speech, though the latter is perhaps rather more serious, some months since I put the same question again. She replied that after having taken that form twenty-five years ago, she was known by it to her spiritistic friends and it was easier to materialize in an already well-known form than in that of a different and older person; that to do this would alter the conditions and would demand more power. Her voice is that of a child of six or eight years old, with the corresponding imperfectness of pronunciation and expression. When, as frequently happens, she has been speaking for several minutes together, her voice will sometimes bear a resemblance to that of the medium, especially in its nasal tone, and this leads naturally to the suspicion that Mrs. Salmon is a ventriloquist. But when we hear the same voice proceeding from a little materialized figure of not more than three feet in height, a figure which plays around the spectators and allows them to touch it with their hands, while the medium is bound in the cabinet or confined in the cage, we are forced to look for some other explanation. I have seen "Maudy" at least twenty times and always the same; with her pretty little round face, big blue eyes, and fair hair. When she comes out of the cabinet, she is usually clad like a little girl, in a loose night-gown, with bare feet, who wishes to say good-night to the friends of the family. Her figure is so familiar to me that I immediately recognized it in a "psychic" chalk portrait, and in a similar photograph, taken on two different occasions away from my laboratory. She is lively and witty and often laughs at her own rather sarcastic remarks; her laugh being quite different from that of the medium. With apologies to Mrs. Salmon, I may just say, that in the frequent conversations which we have had with her I have found no trace of the liveliness of thought and brightness of intellect which characterize "Maudy."

Waukesha Camp Meeting.

The programs will soon be out for Wisconsin State Camp at Waukesha. The talent so far engaged is: For the first five days, from the 2nd to the following Thursday, Harrison D. Barrett, president of the N. S. A. He is a favorite with the people of Wisconsin, and that he will be with us at the opening means a good attendance from the first; Mrs. Catharine McFarlin, who has won the hearts of all who have met her, will take a leading part until the first of the next week, when the Rev. Moses Hull and his estimable wife Mattie, will arrive and remain the rest of the season; Will C. Hodge, the able exponent of Spiritualism, the friend of mediums and supporter of honest effort, will arrive about the same time and remain indefinitely; Will J. Erwood, the justly popular speaker, worker and medium, will be on the ground the entire season and take an active part in all the interests of the camp, filling the pulpit in whatever capacity the need may be. For music, the famous Parker and Bowen musicians, of Niagara Falls, N. Y., have been engaged for the last ten days which means a rare treat for western Spiritualists. They will train a chorus on the ground and give several concerts. Dr. Nellie C. Mosier, who carried the people of Wonewoc camp with such force last summer, will be with us the entire time. And last, but by no means least, Geo. W. Kates and wife will be present the last five days. Who has heard Mrs. Kates give tests and does not want to hear her again?

Other workers will take part, but as yet have not given the time they expect to be on the ground.

Phenomenal mediums of all phases are expected. Meals will be served on the grounds, and tenters can furnish for themselves when desired. Those who intend renting tents should notify Secretary Will J. Erwood, 1334 Pine street, LaCrosse, Wis., as soon as possible, so that tents and floors will be ready. The camp will open August 2, and close the 31st.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

AN AUSTRIAN PROFESSOR SEES HIS SPIRIT MOTHER.

BY PROFESSOR EARL VON THALER — SPECIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

Vienna, Austria.—Don't ridicule the man or woman who claims to have seen ghosts, for, while there may be no ghosts, one may see ghosts. May see them and talk to them, and cuddle and love them—I have done it myself.

Ten years ago my mother died. We had loved each other dearly—friends called us "the inseparables." So fond of me was the good woman that, when I went to college, she broke up her home to follow me to the big city, keep house for me, care for me and assist me in my studies, for this was a wise and ambitious mother.

All her evenings were devoted to literary work—she burned the midnight oil to help pay for my education. When through, she usually crept in where I was sleeping, to see whether everything was right, the window open, but not too far; the little wax light aflame in the glass where a small quantity of oil floated on a larger bit of water.

And after arranging my linen and clothes for the morning she used to sit down by the bed and listen to my breathing. Often, when I awoke, I saw her eyes rest on my face with tender care.

Of course, when I grew to man's estate, professional duties put a stop to the idyl. Drawing away from childhood habits these pleasantries were gradually shelved and, in the end, almost forgotten.

But when mother was dead all came back to me, her kindly attentions, her acts of self-sacrifice, her enduring love. The funeral of the dear one put me to a heavy mental and physical strain, and when, late in the night, I went to bed, I was thoroughly exhausted and cried with grief and nervousness. As I got into bed I thought over and over again: "Poor boy that I am, no mother to love and care for me; no one to cuddle me as I lay myself down to sleep."

I don't think I remained awake for any length of time. I dreamed that once more I was a student in that big, strange, university town, and that mother was walking with me in the nearby forest, of which we knew every nook and corner. The mother of those bygone days was young and pretty and healthy, and so was the central figure of my dream. Ah, how glad I was I had found her again. She talked as usual and gave me much good advice as mothers are wont to do.

We enjoyed each other's company for many hours—it may have been only for the infinitesimal part of a second according to dream laws, but I thought it an eternity of joy. But suddenly I was overcome by the recollection that mother was dead. I looked up to her and before I knew what I was doing said: "I thought I buried you this afternoon; was that a dream or is this?"

As I pronounced the words the good woman's face fell, the smile playing around her lips vanished, her whole aspect changed. She looked twenty years older and her face was now deadly pale.

Seeing this I awoke with a start. If my body had been plunged into ice-cold water I couldn't have been more awake than I was. And there before me in the mild light of the waxen taper sat mother at the foot of the bed, as she was wont to do in days gone by. And as of old those mild, big, dreamy eyes rested on me with tender attention. There was no delusion, I am positive of that. I was as completely awake as one can be, yet the spectre didn't frighten me in the least. On the contrary I liked its presence and responded to its tender gaze with eyes full of joyous tears.

"The dead," argued my mind, trained in science—"the dead don't rise, but loving remembrances often recalls them to their former sphere."

My mother's ghost, still clothed in the garb she wore in life, appeared to me twelve times all told. After her first visit I waited several months in vain, awakening at certain hours in the night to look for the dear woman. At the end of the third month she came again, repeating her visits thereafter in longer or shorter intervals.

Two years after her death I saw my mother for the last time. As on all former occasions it was night. I was speeding toward the Italian frontier in a private railway carriage. I had the carriage all to myself, for being unable to sleep on the train I never make use of the sleeping car and instead bribe the conductor to give me a whole carriage to myself.

I had stretched out on one of the upholstered benches at full length, weighing in mind some scientific problem, while my eyes were closed. When, after half an hour or so, I opened them suddenly I noticed my mother seated at my feet. The upper part of her body was bent toward me, her eyes sought mine, her attitude was that of the listener. I could distinguish every feature, for the light of the ceiling shone with unusual brightness, the train having only just started. I didn't move, but after gazing upon the beloved figure for some time, closed my eyes again, thinking of her and of the many pleasant years we had spent together. To make sure that I was fully awake, though, I pressed the button of my repeating watch, 12:30. After a while I consulted the watch again, 1:15, and the spectre still there, immovable, mild, life-like.

Three quarters of an hour later, by the clock, I opened my eyes a third time, and there was mother as I had seen her before, in dream and life. But as I was going to make certain and arise, the spectre faded away never to return. My fantasy was never strong enough, thereafter, to conjure up the dear woman.

Many who read this will undoubtedly say: "He dreamed with his eyes open." I deny that I did, with all emphasis. On all the twelve occasions mentioned I was fully awake—no deception possible, upon my word as a man.

Here is another ghost story founded on facts: Some little time ago there died in Vienna an old friend of mine, Mme. von Maytner, better known under her nom de plume, Marguerite Halm. She was an eccentric woman, full of heaven storming ideas, her mind freighted with thought for which she didn't always find clear and concise expression according to accepted notions. However, I understood her and appreciated her as a brave, brainy and good hearted woman.

One day in the summer of 1900 I happened to pass through Graz, where she was then living, and, not having seen her for some time, made an unceremonious call. I found her in a state bordering on collapse; she had aged ten years since our last meeting. Her youngest son, her favorite, was dead—that explained everything.

When I said good-by she begged me to come again before leaving Graz. "But not between 5 and 6," she said quickly, "that's my son's visiting hour."

"Which of the boys is living in Graz?"

"None living here—it's my favorite whom I expect, my youngest."

I looked up in astonishment. A ghost in broad daylight!

"Don't think that I am mad," pleaded Madame von Maytner. "I know that there is no such thing as rising from the dead, but, nevertheless, I see my son daily. I must see him—I do see him, and talk with him—it's such a consolation to me."

Well, I understood my poor friend, but her neighbors did not. Her physician, particularly, instead of putting himself in a grieving mother's place, let cold reasoning get the better of his power of diagnosis. Stirred up by the neighbors, he committed Madame von Maytner to an insane asylum from which her eldest son rescued her with difficulty after a prolonged struggle.

Here is another experience of my own: Michael Etienne, the great editor of the Neue Freie Presse, was dead—a wise, kindly, generous and jovial man he had been, for though strenuous and even terrible in his anger, his disposition was that of a child.

As one of his nearest friends I sat up with the body the night before the funeral until 1 o'clock in the morning, when members of the editorial staff relieved me.

The body was lying in state in a large hall appropriately draped and lighted. I sat at the foot end, gazing upon my dead friend's characteristic face, which bore the usual aspect of jovial satisfaction. Indeed, it looked as if Etienne had lain down to sleep after a day's hard work, and as if this sleep gave him no end of pleasure.

After being relieved I went to the Presse office to fetch away a roll of manuscript from Etienne's desk; his wife had asked me to do her that service.

It was 1:45 o'clock a. m. when I entered the late editor's room, holding a lighted candle in my hand, which, of course, lit up only certain portions of the vast apartment. As I walked in with care, to avoid coming in contact with the furniture, I saw my friend sit in the great fauteuil behind his writing desk that stood between two windows. He looked as life-like as ever in his best days—the type of a healthy, prosperous, good-natured, blond Teuton.

Hundreds of times I had seen him there, his ample limbs generously disposed, his head thrown back, his chest out, left hand resting on the arm of the chair, the right grabbing the inevitable blue pencil. And the good-natured smile that made so many friends for him was in evidence, too—it seemed to invite me to come nearer.

I should interpolate here that I am somewhat short-sighted. If the editor had really been in his chair I might have been physically debarred from making the minute observations above recorded. As it was, I noted every feature, every wrinkle and line in that grand face.

I stopped in my tracks—the surprise was too much, but after a moment or two I approached fearlessly. I had had some experience, you know.

Michael continued to regard me smilingly, complacently. If this was a ghost he was of a most pleasant sort. Another step, and yet another. When I was near enough to touch the figure (if it was one) it vanished.

I think this a typical case. Remember, I had been alone with the dead for several hours and the peaceful and pleasant aspect of his face was still vivid in my mind when I entered the editorial rooms. Moreover, on my way to the Presse office I had thought only of Etienne, reflecting on the many happy hours and days and years we spent together.

These thoughts and recollections, I reckon, created the picture of the man that I saw with my physical eye.

The "how?" is a question which exact science will solve sooner or later. Certain it is, that mind and brain worked in perfect unison to conjure up what I did see.

For the rest I can only repeat: There are no ghosts, yet we see them, at least some of us do. I know many people who claim to have seen ghosts, or what looked like ghosts. All of them, like myself, were of a nervous disposition and all possessed an imaginative mind. In addition, they were mostly religious men and women, who believed in life after death, in heaven and hell, in eternal joy and the opposite. Their religious views seemed to emphasize their belief in ghosts, indeed many assumed that ghosts had a legitimate business here, that of carrying news from the other world to their friends on this. Ghosts warned and encouraged them, prophesied evil and brought good tidings.

Such, of course, are the sort of ghost stories that free-thinkers laugh to scorn, but to characterize them simply as lies and superstitions won't do, for, if not all, certainly a great many ghost stories are founded on fact, as my own experience abundantly shows.—Milwaukee Sentinel.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold, Keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for nineteen (19) two cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc. FRANCIS CASEY, St. Louis, Mo.

FROM ENGLAND.

The British Spiritualists' Lyceum Union.

The Thirteenth Annual Conference was held at Walsall on the 10th and 11th of May, 1902.

The president, Mrs. Albert Wilkinson, of Nelson, was supported by Councillor John Venables; J. J. Morse, of London; A. E. Sutcliffe, treasurer; and Alfred Kitson, secretary. After the opening exercises, Councillor Venables gave a hearty welcome to the delegates. He accorded each a hearty welcome. He trusted the conference would be harmonious. Their united aims was for the welfare of the children, and he felt sure that all matters that came under their consideration would be dealt with in the highest spirit of love.

The president responded. After which tellers and a messenger was elected.

After a brief introductory address by the president, the conference got to business, taking the minutes of the last Annual Conference and the Interim Conference. These disposed of it was decided to suspend the "standing orders."

Among the correspondence was a letter from the Past President, Mr. Alfred Smedley, regretting his inability to attend, and enclosing a cheque for £5 towards the Permanent Secretary Fund. Mr. A. E. Kealing (Liverpool) delivered a congratulatory message from Mr. A. J. Davis, America, which was received with loud applause. Letters were also read from Mrs. M. E. Cadwallader, Philadelphia, U. S. A., relating to the celebration of their Golden Jubilee. A congratulatory letter had been sent to Mrs. Cadwallader, of which the following is a copy:

"April 26, 1902.

"Fraternal greetings and congratulations from the Executive Council of the British Spiritualists' Lyceum Union.

"To all who are assembled in honor of the Fiftieth Anniversary of the First Association of Spiritualists of Philadelphia.

"As distance prevents us from being with you in bodily presence, then in spirit we cross the blue waters of the broad Atlantic to greet you in the true essence of fraternal fellowship. We pray that this your celebration will be all that your hearts' best aspirations can wish, and your souls' holiest ideas can conceive, crowned by the presence of that bright company: the arisen Martyrs and Pioneers of Modern Spiritualism, who, during those last fifty years have devoted the best part of their lives to our glorious cause, and who now re-assemble with you in honor of your Jubilee. All hail! to the Pioneers and Martyrs both in the spirit and the flesh.

"And while you are celebrating your Jubilee may we be allowed to suggest that you mark and emphasize the occasion by some scheme, some project that shall have for its aim and object the inculcation of the highest, grandest, and best that Modern Spiritualism has revealed unto you being given unto the children in the most attractive form. So shall future generations meet to celebrate the anniversaries of this your glorious Jubilee.

"Signed on behalf of the Executive Council.

"ALBERT WILKINSON, Pres.
"ALFRED KITSON, Sec'y."

The above was frequently applauded as it was being read to the conference. The conference decided to cable congratulations and endorsement of the letters.

It was decided to renew the appeal for subscriptions to the Permanent Secretary Fund. The experimental year of a partial engagement of the secretary's time, would terminate on September 24, 1902, and it was felt to be urgently needed that his whole time should be devoted to the Union.

The Auditors' report stated that the general fund for the year ending 1900, showed a deficit of £18-18-2½; while for the year ending 1901, showed a balance of £3-18-4½, an increase of £22-16-7, which was mainly due to the increase of contributions, collections at the propaganda meetings, conferences, and the decrease in the train fares, as follows: The contributions had increased £7-15-7½; the collections had increased £10-8-2½; and the traveling expenses had decreased £6-7-4½.

The publishing department showed great prosperity. The Cr. balance this year was £134-11-8, as against £81-4-7½ the previous year. The sales had increased from £99-16-10½ in 1900 to £148-3-4½ in 1901. And the stock in hand, at cost price, had increased from £40-16-3 in 1900 to £233-2-7½ in 1901. The Auditors had no hesitation in stating that the Union was in a thoroughly good financial condition.

The Secretary's report reviewed the work of the past year. The necessity for reconsidering certain Articles in the New Constitution, the Four-Fold Pledge against Intoxicants, Tobacco, Gambling and Swearing. He was taking books of those pledges with him when visiting Lyceums, and presenting them. He appealed to the officers to support his efforts that they may be adopted throughout the movement, and form a strong protection to the young people. He was pleased to say that a gentleman had promised several pounds for the best essays on the subjects of the pledges, which should help to quicken the children's interest in these matters of moral reform.

The Secretary had visited and addressed the following Lyceums during the past year: Richton, Dyceum Anniversary, New Ardenick, in conjunction with the District Visitor. He was sorry to find much local disaffection which had since caused the Lyceum and Society to lapse. Blackhaven (Northgate), Lyceum Anniversary. There was a hearty enthusiastic spirit, which augurs well for its future prosperity. Sheffield United Lyceums gathering in the large Music Hall. The success of the meetings was marred by a severe thunderstorm which passed over the town just previous to the evening meeting. The spirit of harmony and enthusiasm was all that could be desired. The orchestra was filled with Lyceumists, whose singing and recitations evoked loud applause.

Ramtenstall Anniversary was marred by the non-presence of the children. The officers had dismissed them to make more room for the adults. The same mistake was made by the officers of the Halifax (Alma Street) Lyceum at their Lyceum Anniversary. These Anniversaries are the Children's Days and it is a serious mistake debarring them from participating in them in order to make more room for the elders. Great Harwood has a good Lyceum, full of the spirit of harmony and enthusiasm.

Newcastle-on-Tyne still maintains its standard of excellency. Todmorden is a new but promising Lyceum. At the celebration of its first anniversary the spirit of unity and harmony characterized their efforts. Blackburn (Freckleton Street) Lyceum is in a good, healthy condition. Their hall is too small. They are eagerly waiting for the completion of their new one, which will be ready in a few weeks. Bradford (Parkside) is a new Lyceum, but displayed much vigor and life in celebrating its first anniversary. The Secretary was pleased to see a strong spirit of fraternal fellowship binding the little band of workers. Accrington (China Street) is a well established Lyceum. It is well officered, and has a good record. Manchester (Temperance Hall), assisted by Miss Burton: The open session was excellent, and the evening service deeply interesting. The Secretary was pleased to find on his last visit to Lancaster that the fixed pews had been replaced with movable benches which rendered the hall much more serviceable for Lyceum purposes. He was very sorry to find during his last visit to Oldham that, inharmony was creeping into this otherwise well ordered and well officered Lyceum. The sessions were good, and the service excellent.

The Executive Council had held four propaganda meetings during the year, which had been addressed by the members. These meetings were enthusiastic, soul-inspiring, and highly appreciated.

He had enrolled 18 Lyceums during the past year. There were 116 on the Union's register; and 20 others. Total, 136.

The Presidential address was delivered on the Sunday morning, and was loudly applauded. The President alluded to the arrangement re the Permanent Secretaryship; Mr. H. A. Kersey's great kindness in presenting the Union with the copyrights of The Lyceum Manual; The Spiritual Songster, and the valuable stereotypes of the latter. And also to Mr. Alfred Smedley's splendid gift of the entire edition of "Some Reminiscences," value over £200. He hoped soon to see every Lyceum enrolled in the Union, and then instead of asking, "What are the benefits derived from it?" they may testify to the benefits derived through close fellowship with the national body. He desired to support the secretary's remarks re the importance of the four-fold pledge. He should like to see the Lyceums give it a very prominent place in their work. He also referred to Mr. J. J. Morse's generous offer of the Lyceum Banner to the Union, and hoped to see it belong to the Union as it had been the official organ for a number of years.

The Credential Committee reported the presence in conference of three officers, four members of the Executive Council; two auditors; three district visitors for the Union; two district visitors for district councils; and 55 delegates: Total 70.

It was decided to publish a small pamphlet, setting forth the aims, objects, teachings, principles and methods used in our Lyceums.

The conference decided to accept Mr. Morse's offer of the Lyceum Banner, and to give its editor and publisher a hearty send-off ere he leaves us for Australia.

Messrs. S. S. Chiswell and A. Kitson paid a warm and appreciative tribute to Mr. Morse's splendid labors on behalf of the Children's Lyceum. The motion was carried with acclamation.

The Constitution was considered at some length, and greatly improved.

The next Conference will be held in the new Spiritual Temple, Blackburn, on the 9th and 10th of May, 1903.

The elections were as follows: President, Mr. Jonah Clarke (Nottingham); Past President, Mr. Albert Wilkinson (Nelson); Executive Council, Messrs. John Venables, S. S. Chiswell, and Mrs. Jessy Greenwood. The Treasurer, Secretary and Auditors were re-elected unanimously. Messrs. S. S. Chiswell and the Secretary were elected representatives to the Spiritualists' National Unions Conference.

The evening's meeting was large and enthusiastic. The President was supported by the President-elect, Mr. J. Clarke, and Mrs. Clarke, Madames Jessy Greenwood and Place-Veary, Messrs. J. J. Morse, S. S. Chiswell, Will Phillips, the Secretary, and Councillor John Venables.

The President's opening remarks were hearty and full of pathos for the children's cause. He bore testimony of the children's love for the Lyceum and how delighted they were with its sessions. Mr. Alfred Kitson drew attention to the Four-Fold Pledge against intoxicants, tobacco, gambling and swearing, and pleaded for the hearty co-operation of all officers of the Lyceums, and the parents. It was sad to contemplate that nearly all criminals were once Sunday-School scholars, and they should ask themselves the question, "Is our Lyceum work to be as big a failure in influencing and molding the adult life of our scholars as that of the Sunday-Schools has been?" If not, then all must bestir themselves and live exemplary lives before the children, as children were, in a large measure, wonderful imitators of their elders.

Turning to the publishing department of the Lyceum Union, he said that ten years ago they decided to commence a publishing fund to enable the Union to supply all Lyceums with the requisite books for Lyceum work. There were only sixty Lyceums in England at that time, and twenty-six of them were not connected with the Union. The amount they desired to raise was the modest sum of £100. They raised £33-10-10½ the first year. This was increased to £87-13-6 the second year, with an expenditure of $74-15-7½. This was further increased, and the Union received, as a free gift, the copyright of Outlines of Spiritualism, by the Secretary. That was duly published as being the only book written especially for Lyceum children. From that time forward, the fund had been augmented by donations of books, and stereo-plates, until its stock stood at £233-2-7½, its turn over for the past year being £148-3-4½, and its Cr. balance at £134-11-8. The number of Lyceums had increased from 60 to 136, of which 116 were members of the Union. He trusted the work of the next ten years would prove equally successful.

Mr. J. J. Morse said the assistance of the young would maintain the vitality of the Spiritual movement. If they wished to find heaven, let them try to make it here and assist in the training of the children in the Progressive Lyceum. The Lyceum movement was not a part of Spiritualism. It was not to be looked upon as a recruiting ground. Every father and mother owed a debt to society that they should do their best so that their children should grow up honorable men and women. The speaker briefly alluded to the four-fold pledge, and the importance of the same. In bidding farewell to the meeting he spoke of the lack of Lyceums in Australia, and he intended to advocate their claims. He was pleased to say that he had a commission to take 400 copies of the Lyceum Manual, a quantity of the Spiritual Songster, and Outlines of Spiritualism. From this they would see that the fraternal bonds of sympathy were binding those hearts and souls with them on the other side of the globe. [Applause.]

Mr. S. S. Chiswell said they did not want a Spiritualism without spirits. The souls of their arisen leaders and comrades were present with them that night. Mrs. E. H. Britten, Mr. John Lamonts, and that good pioneer, Mr. James Swindlehurst, were present by his side. Those who had taken up the noble work of Spiritualism would never rust out; they might wear out. The Lyceum was the place for renewed inspiration. He asked them that night to re-affirm their adhesion to and love for the children's movement, which was so dear to them. Let those who were willing to consecrate their lives anew to the children's cause arise and hold up their right hand. (The audience arose en masse.) He called the angels to witness their pledge to work for the Children's Progressive Lyceum.

The President-elect referred to the dearth of workers in the spiritual cause, and desired to enlist the sympathy of all. He referred to the temperance question and pleaded for a fuller recognition of its importance. If they worked for the children they would receive the inspiration and presence of the angels to help them.

SPIRITUALISM.

Why Not Call It a Religion?

I observe on the part of some of the scribes an aversion to the word religion, that is almost hysterical. They are wrought up to a frenzy if any one dares to call Spiritualism a religion. It may be a science, or dubbed a philosophy, but a religion, never! Say the word only, and they begin to hurl Calvin and Servetus at you, and to conjure up lurid pictures of Torquemada and the Inquisition. All of this is very distressing—to them. It doesn't hurt us, not a bit.

What is religion? We have had the Latin roots dug up for our edification and we have consulted dictionaries galore, to answer the question, This is well enough, but now I suggest let us find what it actually does mean. What do people mean when they use the word? That is the way to find out. I look at a certain kind of vehicle and say "baggage car." An Englishman calls it a "luggage van." To understand me he finds out just what it is I refer to, then he knows what the words "baggage car" means.

Well, many people say religion. What is it? I am not afraid of the word, provided the thing it describes is harmless. Let us see.

Millions of people believe there is a future life, another world than this. In that world they believe is a God, a Son of that God, created angels, and a host of the spirits of men and women who have died and gone "over there." It is a spirit world.

They believe that at death their spirits will also enter into that spirit realm to be joined to the others and to be "rewarded according to the deeds done in the body."

They further try to live what they call an ideal life to prepare them for the life to come and for association with the good spirits over there. The teaching, or ethics, by which they seek to regulate their conduct is found in a book called the New Testament. Specifically, it is the teaching of Jesus of which the Golden Rule may be taken as an example.

Here are three things to observe and correlate: (1) The belief in a world of spirits. (2) The belief that at death human spirits pass at once to that spirit world. And (3) a better, or best, life to be lived in the flesh by men so that their spirits may be fitted for the spirit world. These three things are the elements of every form of religion known to man. There is a spirit in man; at death it enters a spirit world; to live right here prepares for happiness over there. This is, beyond any cavil, what the word religion means and what, in current human speech, it always refers to.

Now, as a matter of fact, this is a simple statement of Spiritualism also. Your Spiritualist affirms just exactly these three things. He tells us there is a spirit world; at the time of death the spirit of man enters into that spirit world, and last, but not least, a good life here is necessary to fit us for the best over there. In the three fundamentals this is identical with the Christian religion. In fact I boldly affirm that Spiritualism has not added a single valuable concept to the Christian religion. It has not added but has only modified and subtracted.

Modern Spiritualism did not introduce the idea of a spirit world. The idea was here, rather a belief. Spiritualism only modified the idea, enlarged it, divested it of a certain crudeness as to details, and confirmed the belief by incontestible demonstrations.

Modern Spiritualism did not originate the doctrine of the soul's immortality, or the persistence of man's spirit beyond the grave. It found this idea here with men, this hope rooted in human affection, and it gave it a new lease of life by proof palpable that death does not end all.

Neither did Spiritualism introduce into the world the idea that a pure, good, just life here in this world is necessary to the happiness of the spirit over there. Christianity taught this ages before.

Spiritualism did not originate or introduce a single one of these ideas. Moreover, when it came, it did not give up, renounce or destroy a single one of them. It modified some of them in respect to the minor consideration of details. That is all.

Spiritualism changed "I believe" to "I know." At least that is what its friends claim for it. I cannot say for myself. The absolute demonstration of the truth of Spiritualism has not yet come to me. So far as I am concerned yet I can only say "I believe" in a future life. I believe I possess an immortal, undying spirit. I believe in living a good, clean life here to fit me for that "life to come." This is my religion. It is identical with Spiritualism, except my Spiritualist brother says he knows, and rather pities me because I can only believe.

The objection to calling Spiritualism a religion is not well taken. It arises from an ignorant and unreasoning prejudice. But I am not stubborn. Call it right living, if it please you better. The end to be attained is the same in either case, viz.: fitting ourselves for life with the best in the spirit world.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD
A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.
By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

Food, Material and Spiritual.

It appears from the Chicago Tribune that some scientists of Minnesota, who are connected with the State Agricultural Department, have been investigating the nourishing qualities of various kinds of bread. Do you eat whole wheat bread? Are you friendly to graham flour? Is oatmeal mush your favorite breakfast diet? If so, your hygienic faith in their wholesomeness will be rudely shattered by a number of experiments made by the Minnesota State Agricultural Department.

The Minnesota scientists declare boldly that bread made of the ordinary finely ground patent flour of commerce contains more nutrition and is more easily digested than the whole wheat or graham variety.

This will sound like rank heresy to thousands of sufferers from dyspepsia who have deluded themselves into the belief that coarse bread is the only kind they dare eat.

In order to prove their case the Minnesota scientists secured a quantity of Hard Scotch Fife spring wheat, plump and of good quality, weighing sixty pounds to the bushel. This wheat they took to one of the largest mills in Minneapolis, where under the personal supervision of an experienced miller it was ground into five varieties of flour—graham, whole wheat, straight grade of patent, first patent, and second patent. All the five varieties of flour were ground from the same wheat.

The flour was then baked into the various kinds of bread required for the experiments. Three young men, in good health, all active and vigorous, were induced to put themselves on a diet of bread and milk for a number of days under the watchful supervision of the scientists.

The result was something of a surprise to the advocates of whole wheat bread. The amount of digestible protein and the amount of energy actually available to the body were greater in the standard patent flour than in the whole wheat or graham varieties. Graham contained the least digestible protein and available energy.

Incidentally the same experiments were tried on pigs at the Minnesota Experiment Station. It was proven that ground wheat was 10 per cent more digestible than the whole wheat.

From their experiments the Minnesota scientists draw some interesting conclusions, the most important being that men who work the hardest should eat bread made from finely ground flour. The report says:

"To suppose that whole wheat meal, as ordinarily prepared, is, as has generally been assumed, weight for weight, more nutritious than ordinary bread flour, is an utter fallacy, founded on theoretical text book dicta, not only entirely unsupported by experience but inconsistent with it.

"In fact, it is just the poorer fed and the harder working that should have the ordinary bread flour rather than the whole meal bread."

"The Minnesota scientists have also made a number of interesting experiments with other articles of food, from which the following facts are elicited:

Beans are more digestible when combined with milk, butter, and other foods. They are more digestible when the skins are removed.

When milk was used as a ration with bread, butter, beans, eggs and potatoes, all the protein of the milk was digested, and in addition 4.91 per cent more of the protein of the other foods with which it was combined was digested than when the milk was omitted. The highest degree of digestibility was secured in a mixed ration.

Experiments made with butter showed that it has a high degree of digestibility, 98 per cent of it being available to the body.

Cheese should be used in the diet regularly and in small quantities rather than at irregular intervals and in large quantities, as is frequently the case. Cheese ordinarily is one of the cheapest and most nutritious foods that can be procured.

Oatmeal, like cheese and beans, is slow of digestion, requiring much intestinal work for the digestive process. But if well prepared and thoroughly cooked it is a suitable food for persons of all habits.

So much for nourishing the physical body, as set forth in the above.

What of Spiritual food?

That which the various orthodox churches provide for the hungry multitude furnishes no nutriment whatever to the soul. In no sense does it increase those forces so necessary in the process of evolution to a higher plane of existence.

That which is absolutely false does not contain one atom of spiritual food.

That which has no basic foundation of truth can not produce a basic foundation for one's spiritual nature to rest.

The only genuine spiritual food can be found in Spiritualism, and those who are properly nourished by it, advance the most rapidly in everything that pertains to one's spiritual welfare.

Spiritualism and Dowie.

The reason Spiritualism is so financially behind all the religions of to-day is, first, there is nothing in the principles to take hold of the fear of people, the weak side of humanity; second, more attention is paid to the spiritual than to the material side of life and the financial success of the cause depends upon the long perverted generosity of a priest-ridden people; third, the unselfishness of most of our able ones is expected to begin at the brink of the grave and Spiritualism must await the change in humble poverty or work some hypnotic scheme on people, a la Dowie and the churches.

In a recent sermon of this self-appointed Elijah, he in one breath blessed the little children and in the next ordered the mother of a squalling child to "take that brat to the baby house, so I won't have to be annoyed with its noise."

At the same meeting, Dr. Ward, health officer of Zion, brought all his surgical instruments out, explained their use and said the reason he had been induced to lay them aside for Dowieism was, that a spirit with a voice like his own had told him to join Dowie. "Did he tell you I was the prophet of Christ?" asked the healer. "Yes, dear Doctor," was the meek reply.

How do we know that this man is not influenced by the great Elijah, or the spirit of some departed priest who understands the laws of hypnotism and psychic force, and really is making the old healer imagine he is the veritable Elijah?

One thing certain, he has made some wonderful cures and has made many well-to do people lay their all upon his altar, and is on the high road to financial success through his power over his fellow-man. He has surely done that much, and more, he has compelled his victims to be generous, when no other power could, and has compelled the medical monopoly to let him alone, by his spirit of defiance and by bringing forth to his aid the spirit of the law regarding the free exercise of religious rites and ceremonies, which includes divine healing.

He has forbidden the "Santa Claus" fad from being practiced in Zion. In other words, he wants the children to unlearn this universal falsehood.

On the marriage question he says: "Marriage was given by God for two reasons—for the mutual society and comfort of the husband and wife in sickness and death and for the bringing of children into the world. Every child that can be born into the world has a right to be born, and you dogs who in any way prevent it are sinning against God. This is the master sin of the world."

We do not endorse much of Mr. Dowie's illiterate harangue and take no stock in his being the re-embodiment of a person whose origin is so much a matter of doubt, and even whose existence is questioned, but he has stirred up an element that was fast gaining possession of a power that promised to become oppressive in the land, that of the medical fraternity. Dowieism has helped to break that mighty influence that has put its tyrannic hand upon our statute books. "Divine Healing" has gained and is in the ascendency, and the world is growing wiser. It is only magnetic healing under a name assumed to defeat its awful foe.

Mystery has ever been the trap to catch the people and the word "Divine" in this case is doing effectual work to beat down a great enemy to freedom. Call it "Divine" or "Devil," the power is the same, its work is the same, but the effect is greater when you place it in touch with the understanding of the people and in harmony with their minds. It is magnetism under the protecting cloak of religion.

Dowie may be said to have gone mad with prosperity, but he has worked his scheme successfully for Dowie and has actually preached himself under the hypnotic hallucination to that extent of its becoming actual, a fact, or until he believes himself the second coming of Elijah, and invested with all the reputed power of that ancient patriarch. Such is possible as shown in the science of psychology.

For financial prosperity Spiritualists are not very noted, and for natural reasons. Spiritualism teaches the brotherhood of man instead of acquisitiveness, material gain and ambition for power. It teaches that to be loaded down with wealth means selfishness and that will produce spiritual bondage in the life to come, means darkness as a process of correction and unfoldment that may last for ages of time.

Furthermore, Spiritualists are without unanimity, full of independence, which often makes them arbitrary when it would be better for the whole cause for them to try to agree upon at least foundation enough to make a closer and stronger pull.

We have no Pope, no Bishops, Arch-Bishops or Priests; we have no infallible Bible that must be obeyed; we have no hell-fire and damnation to frighten us into the ranks and make us close up; we have no dictators, no Dowies; nothing but our various understandings of duty to the cause we espouse and our consciences to urge us into the union that it looks as though we should have to enable us to do the many things which seem needful both to the cause and the world.

The difference between Spiritualism and Dowieism could not be much greater. Dowie is simply making use of the one-man power and Spiritualism is without it, and it is well. We are not discouraged with the outlook, even if Spiritualism is financially poor. It is a fact, and that will stand where money and material prosperity fail. But to live up to our principles we would spend more time in doing good for humanity, in ascertaining the needs of people and giving aid and less in patting ourselves on the backs for what we know and twitting others of their ignorance.

MINOT J. SAVAGE ABOLISHES DEATH.

And death shall be no more.—Rev. xxi:4.

Toward the last of his life the late Colonel Ingersoll said—I quote his thought, not his language—if he could only be certain of continued personal existence, then the funeral of a friend would become a triumphal procession, a harvest home, accompanied not by tears and heartbreak, but by songs of triumph. Many of the stories in the "Arabian Nights" close with the words: "And so they lived until he came who is 'the destroyer of delights and the sunderer of companies.'"

This was their way of looking at death. In the Old Testament the prevailing idea is that death is the end of all things that appeal to human hope or cheer. The old Greeks held a similar view. Achilles says that he would rather be a servant of a taskmaster engaged in the most menial of occupations here on the green earth than to be king of all the dead. During the middle ages death was the great terror of mankind, and to-day, in spite of the fact that people claim to believe, or think they believe, death is not robbed of its terrors.

Is there any way conceivable, then, by which death may be abolished practically for you and for me? Paul says, "To die is gain," and he cries out, "O, death, where is thy sting? O, grave, where is thy victory?"

He had, as he believed, a knowledge, not a faith merely—that abolished death and put a meaning and a victory into human life such as it had not known from the beginning of the world until then. Do you wonder that young Christianity conquered Rome? Put into the hearts of several thousands of enthusiastic people a hope, a belief in the immortal life, a belief that the death of the body means only the triumph and glory of the spirit all the sooner, and you have an army without fear, and conquest for such is easy. That was the belief of the early church.

Has it persisted? Is it the belief of the church to-day? You know it is not. When a friend is taken away see people heartbroken, see them cast down. Never, since the dawn of Christianity were so many people doubting concerning the future life as there are now; and they are not the ignorant people, they are not the bad people. I cannot prove it scientifically as yet, but I believe that Jesus was seen alive after the crucifixion, and that out of that seeing sprang the great conviction which made the church triumphant over the empire of another Rome.

Why do I believe it? I cannot now go into any prolonged explanation of this faith. I can simply say that, if I can believe that anybody since that time, who has been called dead, has been seen again, then it is perfectly easy to believe that Jesus may have been seen, and if there be any reason for believing a fact like this then the natural immortality of man would be thereby demonstrated.

Let us note a few of those things which constitute the burden, the terror of death, and then outline a theory of things which, if we can accept, would abolish it and give us victory over the grave. I may not stop for proof, but I shall say nothing that is not entirely reasonable and consonant with all our scientific knowledge of the universe. The first terror of death is the fact that we must leave this fair and beautiful world, that we must go out into—what? Nobody knows, we are told. Suppose, in place of this, that we may believe that this physical universe is immersed in what we may call, for lack of a better name, a spiritual universe. Science talks about "the ether," a form matter intangible, invisible, inaudible, and yet more wonderful than anything else than can be touched or heard or seen; and it is demonstrated that such matter exists. Suppose, then, that we are immersed in a universe like this—thrilling, throbbing with life of which we can only dimly conceive as yet—and that, when we go away from the presence of the sun and stars we go into a world grander, fairer than this. If we can believe that, then the terror is taken away.

Another thing that seems bitterer, perhaps, even than this is the separation from friends, the parting with those we love. But suppose we can believe that this separation is only temporary, only for a little while. We could put up with the fact of not seeing them again for ten or twenty years if we could feel assured that some time we should see them; that we could look in their eyes once more, clasp their hands once more, hear the familiar voice once more, and know they were just the same old friends as ever. I do not believe that there is anything in the fact of death that changes us any more than going to sleep last night and waking up this morning. Why should there be? Death is only another kind of birth; we graduate from this life; we take the next step in an ever-advancing and ever-rising career, and we are just ourselves over there.

There is another terror that has haunted the imaginations of the world. This is the fear that there is something in death which fixes the condition for good or evil, for joy or sorrow, forever. Suppose in place of that we can believe that God is just as good on the other side of death as He is on this side. Suppose we can believe that it is one God and one law on both sides of death in this world and in all worlds; that there is no such thing as arbitrary reward or arbitrary punishment, but that throughout the universe there are only results, inevitable results, beneficent results, wisely ordered results.

I cannot think that this great universe, rising under the impulse of infinite lifting and guidance for millions of years, is by and by to be snuffed out, is by and by to plunge over an abyss into eternal darkness and night. I cannot believe that the end of all our knowledge is to be that "there is nothing in it." I cannot believe, as John Fiske says, we are to be put to a "permanent intellectual confusion."

This life is but the prologue to a great drama, illustrating infinite wisdom and infinite power and infinite love. What we call death is only a lowering of the curtain for the time that precedes the first great act. Now let me ask you to read two or three lines because they are so wonderful and beautiful and strong. They fitly crown that to which I have tried to give expression:

There shall never be one lost good.
What was, shall live as before;
The evil is null, is naught, is silence
implying sound;
What was good shall be good, with for evil so much good more;
On the earth the broken arcs; in the heaven, a perfect round.

If we may cherish the great belief I have tried to suggest, then we may walk through life not as those impelled by an evil force from behind—walk through life not dreading to grow old—walk through life believing that old age is not decay, but only ripening. We may walk through life until we come to what was the great terror, and look him in the face and find that he is a friend.

Mediumship and Education.

The Morris Pratt Institute has awakened discussion and thought in the Spiritualist ranks along lines that may lead to clearer views of mediumship and its relations to education, or the relations of education to mediumship.

It is a rather prevalent conception among many Spiritualists that mediumship denotes a state of passivity in which the medium is used as a mere automatic instrument by spirit influences, as a flute or violin is played upon by the performer, the medium being wholly irresponsible, and possibly wholly unconscious of what is done through his or her organism.

No doubt there are instances where this definition will apply; but taken as a general statement, applicable to mediumship in general, it is incorrect, misleading and very erroneous.

Properly, mediumship does not imply that the medium is a mere passive puppet under the control of spirit intelligences, without independent will and thought of his own, for the time being, indefinitely; a mediumship in which one's own intellectuality is submerged or becomes dormant, and his individuality yielded to other and unknown influences.

One's individuality is a most sacred thing, and self-control should never be yielded to any power whatever. The passive condition, while it allows pure spiritual beings to approach and manifest their power, it also renders the medium open to the approach of impure and depraved spirits, and also to mortals of low and degraded character.

Happily there is another grade and quality of true mediumship, a grade in which the medium is not passive, as passivity is generally understood, but is simply receptive; the medium does not yield his individuality, nor his self-control, nor yield or auto-suggest his intellectuality into a state of dormancy, but with intellect awake and alert, listens to the "voice" of the spirit, weighs the "word" with keenest and most active judgment, accepting or rejecting the same, just as he would accept or reject the word of mortal utterance, and giving utterance to the "word" so far as it was in conformity with his best judgment of truth.

In this receptively-active mediumship there is education; it often spurs the mind to highest mounts of thought, and most active exertions of intellectuality, to follow and comprehend and assimilate the thought of the spirit thus given to—and not merely through—the medium.

Those who are consciously gifted with this grade of mediumship know by experience the high and rich mental stimulus given in this exercise of one's faculties. It gives expression, strength, and often carries one to heights unknown before, and depths of thought beyond former attainment.

Now education, the thorough culture of the faculties of the mind, prepares one's mind for the reception of a high grade of spiritual intelligence, which shall be uplifting to the mentality and spirituality of the medium and to those to whom the medium communicates the divine message.

This "receptive" mediumship is strengthened by education, study and thought.

Lost Her Fortune While in a Trance.

It appears from the Chicago American that Mrs. Ethel Laveen, who lives in Malden, Mass., has had the misfortune of losing a sweetheart who had twice promised to marry her, and also $1,000 in cash. Finally she went to Boston to see a Tremont street trance medium and hypnotist, who was highly recommended as one who could see into the future and tell her whether Runnels loved her dearly or not, and whether she would be successful in her suit. Mrs. Laveen says she was deeply impressed with the medium, as he told her upon entering the office, and before she told him who she was, that she had a large sum of money about her. This so astonished her that she immediately put her hand on her neck to see if the $1,000 which she carried in a bag attached to a string around her neck, was safe.

After being in the office a short time she told her love story and troubles to the medium and asked him his advice. He found out what month she was born in and, after consulting the stars, told her that he would have to put her into a trance in which she would talk, and he would afterward tell her what was best to be done in the case. He made a few passes with his hands over her face and eyes and she was in the trance for over an hour. When she woke up the man was snapping his fingers in her face and calling upon her to wake up. She felt dazed for a time. The medium afterward told her that the case was a most complicated one, and one of the most difficult he ever handled, as the stars and planets did not seem to act in her case. He told her to go home and remain in her room for two days and not to speak to any one, and to sit in the room with her fingers crossed and come within a week to see him again.

Mrs. Laveen went home and remained in her room all that afternoon and evening, with her fingers crossed, and did not speak to any one in the house. On removing the package attached to her neck she was astonished upon opening it to find that the money had been removed and some forty or fifty newspaper clippings the size of ordinary bills neatly folded had been inserted in place of the money. As the medium told her not to leave the house for two days she did not report the matter to the police until the next day, when she called at the Malden police station.

Mrs. Laveen went to Boston with Inspector Wolf and showed him the office where the robbery is alleged to have occurred. The office was found closed with a sign on it, "Out of the city for a few days."

In all the large cities there is a class of disreputable mediums who prey upon the public. They are simply vampires, vultures, as it were, constantly looking for prey. They possess a certain degree of mediumship, and being controlled by a class of spirits whose moral nature is of a low order, they are able to do a great deal of harm. The above is only one of many cases constantly occurring. In this city the venerable Dr. Cole had an experience of this kind which cost him $8,000. Others we might name have been victims of this disreputable element.

Victims of a Flimmer.

"Prof. Root," an alleged clairvoyant, who held forth at No. 808 Harrison street, Elkhart, Ind., has disappeared, and up to 2 o'clock this afternoon ten victims had reported at the residence named an aggregate loss of $206. The victims range from a thirteen-year-old girl ($8.50 to an old man whose name is not known, who paid $101 for a common horseshoe magnet and piece of writing paper inscribed with hieroglyphics resembling stenographic notes.

The amounts admitted to have been lost by the other victims are $21, $10, $31, $5, $6.75, $4.50, $20.50 and $8. The victims, who began arriving at the residence Sunday afternoon, freely admitted their folly, some regretting the loss of the money, some declaring they "didn't care," and others asking only that their names be not made public. One woman whose appearance indicated she could ill afford the outlay, called with a babe in arms, told of her experience and asked that her husband be not informed.

The "Professor" promised to return to-morrow, but as he took all his effects—and the money—his return is not expected. His patrons say that he asked to be given the money, which he was to charm and this have revealed to him the information which the patron was seeking. The old man himself carried the $101 wrapped in the paper with the magnet five days, calling each day to have the "Professor" go through some incantations, but on the last call, Saturday, the "Professor" surreptitiously removed the money, and when the old fellow examined the packet Sunday found nothing but the magnet, which he gave to the interviewer with the remark that it cost him $101.

The "Professor," who said he was 29, does not look to be over 25. He has a light complexion, smooth face, silvery voice, perfect teeth and magnetic eyes, one of which has a slight cast. He was visited by scores of persons, chiefly young ladies, to whom he gave ordinary "readings" for fifty cents.

The above is from the Daily Review, of Elkhart, Ind. We find at one end of the rope an artful trickster; at the other end those who lack ordinary common sense, ranging near to actual idiocy. The trickster found them easy victims—so easy, no doubt, that they excited his contempt. If they had been constant readers of The Progressive Thinker they never would have been so badly beaten out of their money; they would have been quick to discern the deceit practiced. In all the large cities and in some of the smaller ones, fake clairvoyants fatten off of the credulity of the people.

Impervious.

The whole earth doesn't pause from its busy, hustling, rotation to quiver when a small pimple like Mount Pelee, or Mount Vesuvius bursts and tears a little hole in her side. The great ocean does not cease to ebb and flow because some little water spout comes down from a passing cloud and takes a drink. The entire supply of air does not become putrid when a grasshopper dies and decays. The human race does not cease to multiply and replenish the earth because some one died and set them back one number. Neither will Spiritualism die because fraud besets it on every hand, or because some narrow-minded editor of a big daily spreads his ignorance of its principles and philosophy in long primer, wide measure, before his one hundred thousand, or one thousand prejudiced readers. Spiritualism seldom takes any notice of such small matters; her advocates are too busy with the higher thought and too peace-loving, and broad-minded, and generous, and considerate to pay attention to people who do not want to understand.

Let us not worry, the truth is indestructible as life and Spiritualism is impervious to these small javelins.

A LITTLE GIRL SEES AND TALKS WITH SPIRITS.

I wish to say a few words through your valuable paper in regard to the great work that Mrs. Clara Ferris is doing for Spiritualism. I have been investigating this matter for some time, visiting local circles and mediums in different parts of the country, traveling mediums and lecturers, and have seen some considerable physical manifestations and gotten many tests, but none of these could satisfy the yearnings of my soul for knowledge as to the foundation and principles upon which Spiritualism rests; Mrs. Ferris, however, convinced me. She is not only finely educated and a cultured lady, outside of Spiritualism, but she possesses rare knowledge in that regard, and the most important part of it is, she has the gift of teaching those grand truths. She is a powerful medium and an excellent teacher.

I have heard many lectures, but the trouble with them all is, while their delivery is excellent, and they may be full of the subject, the lecture is delivered and they are gone, and among the masses, the bulk of it is forgotten. They make statements, produce arguments to sustain them perhaps, but the presentation is such that only those that are far advanced can understand and comprehend them. It seems to me that the best and most effectual way is the plan followed by Mrs. Ferris of forming classes, and teaching thoroughly the ground work and then encourage advancement.

Mrs. Ferris organized a class here and I put my little daughter, 11 years of age in the class. I had taken her to many mediums, lecturers, etc., and while she had gained some knowledge, it was superficial and theoretical and not practical. The second lesson from Mrs. Ferris, she began to see and communicate with spirits, and the fourth lesson she could carry on conversation with those on the other side as well as any one in this life.

Mrs. Ferris teaches the development of our own individuality, and while my little daughter communicates as readily with the spirits as with us, she has never been in a trance.

I believe good literature should be circulated among the people, and every one, no matter how far advanced, should be encouraged to press on.

Mrs. Ellen Voorhees.

The death and funeral service of the late Mrs. Ellen Voorhees, of Chicago, took place at the residence of Mr. Fred Manchester, 824 O'Farrell street, San Francisco, Cal., June 3. The body was taken to her old home to be placed beside that of Mr. Voorhees who died two years ago. The service was conducted by Mrs. Anna Gillespie and Mrs. R. S. Lillie. Mr. Gillespie and Mr. Manchester sang two songs selected by Mrs. Voorhees, "Only Remembered," and "Passing out of the shadows." The large parlors were filled with friends whose faces grew tender and wet as the words of the beautiful songs were heard, for they had learned to love the brave woman who had been so long in the shadow of pain, and had so patiently borne the burden.

Mrs. Voorhees fought the battle for life with all power of her wonderful strength of character, but when the last hour came she folded her hands, closed her eyes, and with a smile passed on to be with the dear ones who waited for her on life's brighter side, and in death she looked not like one defeated, but like a victor.

DO YOUR THINKING WITH LEFT SIDE OF YOUR BRAIN.

The human brain is shaped like a "dumb-bell" tenement—half on the left side and half on the right side.

And all your thinking is done with the left side of it.

Such is the extraordinary announcement made by Dr. Charles Phelps, surgeon to Bellevue and St. Vincents's hospitals, in the May number of the "American Journal of the Medical Sciences."

It is possible, says Dr. Phelps, to have the whole right side of your brain taken out without doing the slightest injury to your intelligence or reasoning power.

But the slightest bruise on the left side of the brain may turn you into a gibbering idiot for the rest of your life.

Dr. Phelps gives as proof of his statement an account of eight hundred cases of brain trouble that have come under his personal notice in Bellevue and St. Vincent's hospitals.

In two hundred and sixty-two of these cases he made post-mortem examinations. Without a single exception he found that when the injury was on the right side of the head the mind of the patient was normal, but when the injury was on the left side, the patient was insane or mentally affected.

From this theory of Dr. Phelps some very remarkable conclusions may be formed. For instance:

1. To be shot or struck on the right side of the head means no more than a physical injury.

2. To be shot or struck on the left side of the head means an injury to the brain, general insanity.

3. Every disorder of the mind is located on the left side of the head.

4. When in danger of physical injury, always protect the left side of the head more carefully than any other part of the body.

It may be that a man or woman of great genius uses both brains. A Shakspeare, a Webster or an Emerson may have had both the right and left departments in operation.

But in every one of the eight hundred cases examined by Dr. Phelps, the right side of the brain was of no more real use than a fifth wheel on a wagon or a second rudder on a boat.

All the mental faculties were found to be located in what surgeons call "the left prae-frontal lobe of the brain."

Dr. Phelps gives the following cases in which the right side of the brain was injured and even entirely taken out without doing any damage to the mind of the patient.

Case No. 1.—Pistol shot wound in right temple. Patient walked five miles to hospital and on admission was conscious, coherent and intelligent.

There was no paralysis, no affection of special senses, no loss of control. Up to the third day the patient responded rationally to questions, but on the fourth day became unconscious and died.

An examination showed that the bullet had passed through the central part of the right frontal lobe. Yet there had not been the slightest sign of mental injury in the patient.

Case No. 2.—A boy of six years of age was struck upon the right side of the head by a piece of scantling thrown from the roof of a five-story building.

A large part of the right frontal lobe and part of the brain substance were removed, yet the boy's mental condition remained normal, his disposition was cheerful and in every way he appeared to be free from any sort of mental injury.

Case No. 3—A clergyman preached and catechised during the three days before his death, yet a post-mortem examination showed that half of the right hemisphere of the brain was completely decayed and changed into a yellow substance.

Case No. 4—In an accident a man had the whole right side of his brain destroyed. He recollected being taken to the hospital. In eighteen months the wound was healed and his mind from first to last was absolutely uninjured and clear.

Dr. Phelps also reports twenty-six cases in which the patients had received gun-shot wounds on the right side of the head, yet in not one instance was the patient injured mentally.

On the other hand, in fifty or more cases of gunshot wounds on the left side of the head, wherever the bullet had penetrated to the brain substance, the patient was delirious or paralyzed.

Dr. Phelps sums up his conclusions in the following two propositions:

1. The more absolutely the lesion is limited to the left prae-frontal lobe, the more positive and distinct are the symptoms of mental default.

2. The integrity of the mental faculties remains unimpaired in right frontal lesion, though it involves the destruction of the entire lobe, or even extends to the entire hemisphere.

Many a medical mystery is explained by Dr. Phelps' hypothesis.

If his conclusions are correct, it is clear how a man has often been known to live for years with a bullet wound in his brain.

It is no mystery any longer how a would-be suicide can drive a four-inch nail into his head and yet survive and talk rationally for days.

It is not a staggering problem when a man has the whole side of his head kicked in by a horse and yet retains all his mental faculties for many years afterwards.

The answer to all of these problems is—it was the right side of the brain that was injured in each case.

The right side of the brain is not at all necessary, according to Dr. Phelps, and the loss of several pounds in weight is the only result that would follow its entire removal.

President Holder on Equal Suffrage

President Arthur E. Holder, of the Iowa State Federation of Labor said at the Federation's annual meeting, held in Cedar Rapids, a short time ago:

"Many organizations with elaborate titles talk about the condition of women and children wage-earners. Let the trade unions of Iowa do something for them. Open wide the avenues of discussion, illustrate the advantage of collective bargaining, instead of destructive wage-cutting by individual competition. If we would be consistent by saying, 'Equal rights for all,' regardless of sex, and herald to the world that the trade unionists of Iowa are willing to take advanced ground, and declare with no uncertain sound that we are willing to give our sisters the ballot. If we are, then let us conscientiously help them to get it.

"Our platform of principles emphatically declares that we draw no line as against creed, color, nationality, or sex. Woman has taken her place side by side with man in industrial and professional pursuits. This is all a part of our economic development, and no human power is strong enough to regulate her; no one is audacious enough even to propose it. We know where our duty lies, and that is to give women all the protection possible. If we are in earnest, and prevail upon them to see the necessity of organization, can we say, Stop at the threshold of the trade union? No; we must show our sincerity by adding, You are responsible citizens; you are our industrial associates; you are entitled to all the privileges and and duties, as well as the responsibilities, of your new station in life; the open door of the franchise shall be given you. When women are given wider opportunities they will improve them, and no problem of child labor will stare us in the face."

DOUBT.

'Tis nature's law; that once at rest,
The boulder should forever lie
Unmoved beneath the placid sky,
Asleep upon earth's quiet breast;

That once in motion, worlds shall sweep
Forever on their destined way;
That, through the night and through the day,
Unswerved their pathways they should keep.

And so the mind of man would cling
Forever to its old-time faith,
Whatever word the new age saith,
Whatever light the new suns bring.

Unquiet are the waves of doubt
That toss forever round the world,
On which our restless ships are whirled
As tides flow in and tides flow out.

But rotting on the oozy strands,
Our ships would crumble and decay
Did not the waves about them play,
And sweep them off to other lands.

THE SOUL'S CRY.

O! for the light to pierce the clouds
Whose pall-like folds my soul enshroud;
The light, whose dayspring from on high,
Before whose beams all shadows fly.

No more to doubt and fear a prey,
No more to falter by the way;
The light of love my steps to guide,
And courage give whate'er betide.

Within its pure and steady ray,
My soul to strengthen day by day;
To hush the tumult of its strife,
To live its deeper, truer life.

The bulwark of its truth to be
The rampart of its purity;
What can of weakness or of sin
Its hallowed precincts enter in!

Its deeps to sound, its heights to climb,
To seize and hold the truth sublime;
'Tis love, the captive soul sets free
From chains of sin and slavery.

Is not this glimpse vouchsafed to me,
The heaven of heaven's true prophecy?
O! for patient faith to wait
To pass within its shining gate.

A SURVEY OF SPIRITUALISM.

Address of Hudson Tuttle, at the 54th Anniversary of Modern Spiritualism, Before the Five United Spiritual Societies of Cleveland, Ohio.

How swift the tide of years runs into the past! What changes have come! We are only certain that all things will pass, and not be to-morrow as they are to-day. As we meet in this annual gathering there are many new faces, but oh, we miss those who have been constantly in their places in the years before, who one by one have passed through the shadows. I will not call their names for to others more competent is assigned the task of fraternal mention. We miss them, we mingle our tears of sorrow for our loss, forgetting that it is their gain; forgetting that the Angel of death standing by the gateway draped with weeds of woe, when he opens the portal becomes the Angel of Resurrection! We cannot say departed, for we know they are with us. We cannot say they are dead who have awakened into spiritual activity. We may not see them with our physical eyes, but we feel that they are with us as of old. The brooding influence of this invisible host, consecrates our meetings and for the time this place is a sacred shrine for the harmonious interchange of spiritual impressions.

THE WORK WROUGHT IN FIFTY YEARS.

On the threshold of the second half-century of Modern Spiritualism we ask, what has been accomplished?

Is the world better for its coming?

Are we improved intellectually, morally, spiritually by the new views of spirit life and of the mysterious hereafter?

There are many who remember what was taught by the world's spiritual teachers before its advent, for events have followed with such rapidity that a human life spans the years. Without criticism or disparagement of religious systems, it may be said that they did not have a single clear and tangible idea of the estate of the so-called dead. Whether the spirit after death, went to a dark and inexplicable place of detention, waiting the resurrection of the physical body at the judgment day; remained with that body in the grave, or was blotted out to be restored by a fiat of God at the final resurrection, was a subject of endless controversy and gave free rein to theological fancy. The Old Testament inclines to making the grave the end, and the New gives no clear idea of the character of future life. St. Paul when in a trance, taken to heaven, could only say that he saw things unlawful to utter. The popular idea may be gained by the superstition that ghosts always appeared in their grave clothes, as though coming from their tombs, and returning thither.

And after the judgment day there was by the same fervor of imagination, two places provided; a heavenly city carved out of gold and precious stones, without a tree or flower in its shining streets, a drop of water in its dazzling enclosure. What would redeemed angels want of a drop of water? What would the four and twenty elders? On a white throne sat Jehovah in regalia of an Oriental despot, with Christ at his right hand, and the elders, priests, archangels and the few redeemed, whose sole occupation was singing praises on golden harps and extolling the mercy and justice of God because of their escape from damnation. They were so full of joy that they forgot the old earth-life and all their friends and dependent dear ones.

The other place was an abyss plunging down into "outer darkness" yet illuminated by the fiercest fires divine wrath could kindle, and there the vast majority of mankind expiated the sins they never committed, in endless pain.

You might have ventured to speak of things following a certain order and law in this world, but over the world after death; over all man's spiritual life, an irresponsible being reigned supreme by direct interference and miracle. On the coast-line against which break the dark waves of the infinite reaches of the spiritual sea, were horrible shapes of monstrous beliefs which had for ages terrorized the world and made life a torture. Misshapen forms, grotesque and hideous dogmas, were half concealed by wrack and waste. There was the fall of man, original sin, vicarious atonement, eternal punishment, infant damnation, the bottomless pit and Satan.

Look again on that coast! What a transformation! The monstrous forms have vanished and the seeds of the tree of eternal life sown by angel hands clothe it with perennial beauty. Over it glows the light of a cloudless sky. The fires of hell have been extinguished and the devil has disappeared as a dissolving cloud.

The churches claim infallibility, and boast of remaining true to their creeds, but we all can see that they have been loosened from their moorings and dragged ahead. The creeds remain, yet the ministers are careful how they put them before the laymen. Not a church member in a score can tell what his creed is. If they could they would not be members a day!

No longer are doctrinal sermons demanded, such as made the old churches that had no furnaces, in zero weather red-hot with God's wrath, and the children cling to their mothers with fear. No doctrinal sermons—lectures, rather. Oh, no, here in Cleveland I notice Dr. Morgan Wood sets the pace by advertising that on certain evenings he will speak to young man only; on certain other evenings to young women only. What he has to say to the young men about Jesus the young women should not hear; what he has to say to the young women that the young men are not interested in is puzzling; good advertising, although suggestive. And Rockefeller's preacher said, as reported, in a recent sermon, that there are so many in this city who have no knowledge of God or Christ in their hearts, he intends to get down from the silk cushions of his pulpit, and leave the perfumed sermon notes, and labor for Jesus in the streets.

It is such as Rockefeller who take the grace of God out of the lives of millions, and no more than justice his preacher does a little to save those who are so pressed to get bread for those dependent on them they have no time to think of a higher life. And really, while he is trying to save their souls, would it not be well for him to invent some kind of a fire-escape for his employer?

The Methodists have fought woman's rights from the beginning, because St. Paul said the wife should look to her husband as a head, forgetting that the husband might be a sap-head. Now the leaders of that church have by a vote given woman equality, overriding Paul's veto, and she yet may be deacon or preacher leading in these offices as she has always in raising salaries, paying off debts, with fairs, dime parties and grab-bags.

The Presbyterians are restless under the pressure of their creed. It was outlined by Calvin when he had congestion of the liver, and completed by Jonathan Edwards when suffering from dyspepsia. They cannot withstand the sarcasm it invites. There is a constantly growing majority who believe infants have a chance and they see so much goodness in man that they do not believe in total depravity. Recently an eminent divine said there was no need of reforming the creed because of this doctrine, for it was never taught therein!

Never taught? Man's hope of salvation has for two centuries at least depended on believing this doctrine, and no one could be a member of that church unless he subscribed thereto.

It is said after Jonathan Edwards read one of his sermons to his wife, she held up their little child and with tearful eyes asked if that, too, was under God's ban as utterly depraved, and he coldly turned from her, giving her not one word of hope!

Now, Calvin and Edwards are shelved, or soon will be, and this awful doctrine will be cut from the creed, and infants will no longer furnish paying material for hell. I wonder, and wonder, how it is that a vote of a few preachers can decide this matter! If God has made it a rule to damn infants, up to the time of the vote, will he change as soon as the vote is taken? Then all he has been condemning since the creation of man, ought to be released and sent to glory. What a responsibility rests on these preachers! If they are right in revision, they have been wrong—fearfully, atrociously wrong, their teachers were wrong, their Bible is wrong, or has been wofully misunderstood. There has been a steady, onward movement as impelled by an irresistible tide. The atmosphere has been filled with the vibrant thoughts of the angel world, and though resisting brighter ideas of life, clearer views of futurity, have forced acceptance on the most bigoted and reluctant. We date the advent of from the first recognition that the rappings were produced by unseen intelligence fifty-four years ago. It is a convenient starting-point. I well remember discussing the subject of such an anniversary with the venerable Father Lawrence soon after he had received a message from his spirit control, advising the celebration of the day. The suggestion at once found favor and ever since the day has been observed by most societies and lyceums.

But we should not take for granted that Spiritualism began on this day. It is as old as the race of mankind. Even in its modern form there had been equal if not more astonishing manifestations. Mesmerism and animal magnetism had furnished the key to a new psychic world and slowly the clouds were lifting over the domain of spirit. It wanted but a step more, and that was made when it was discovered that the sounds would answer questions intelligently and a signal code was established whereby that intelligence could be expressed.

Now we have distinctly Modern Spiritualism in contradistinction to that which went before. The spirit realm is no longer a vague and cloudy fancy. Ghosts no longer flee the light, and gibber to the moon. Where all was miracle and chance, now came the calm supremacy of law, of order and certainty. In place of belief, came knowledge. The law of gravitation stretched across the abyss of space, holds the myriad worlds, and casts them like gigantic balls along their assigned orbits, and in like manner the zones of the spirit world are balanced in the heavens. By the Law of Evolution, the innumerable forms of life on the earth have been evolved and maintained. By an extension of that law spiritual beings are evolved and sustained. A new department of science was established, not opposed to material or physical science, but its sequel, the Science of Spirit.

It is not a matter of faith, of blind belief, but of knowledge; not to be received as an experience at a revival meeting, but to be carefully, thoughtfully studied as a series of profound problems and dependent corollaries

DIFFERENCE BETWEEN MODERN AND ANCIENT SPIRITUALISM.

I wish here to impress on your minds the fundamental difference, the absolute opposition of this new Spiritualism to the old. The latter is of miracle, the former is of law. I want you to bear in mind the cardinal propositions, that spiritual beings are evolved and sustained by law as unchanging and determinate as when in the mortal body; they hold the same relations to spiritual things that man does to physical creation. On these we can build our spiritual temple nor fear the crumbling of its foundation.

Yet from the beginning there has been contention whether Spiritualism was a religion or a philosophy, or a science. A great number of its believers came out of the churches. They brought with them the shadow of church beliefs and the partiality of their early education. They had longed and sought for evidence of immortality and they found a clear demonstration. They would graft the new scion on the old stock, they would trim the tree as it grew after the old form, they would give old names to new ideas, veneer and varnish over until it would be so like a church it would be respectable!

Many ministers of the gospel were attracted to the new and promising field and the new thought had to contend against their influence, which was for the establishment of church machinery. For the first twenty-five years the term Christian Spiritualism was held by a large number, and journals published under the name. There was deadly fear that some one would think the new cause was infidel, or lead away from the beaten track of the churches. It took a quarter of a century to find out that Spiritualism needed no adjectives!

This partiality for old forms has not been wholly cast off. Societies are formed, and we hear of the First Spiritual Church, of Black City, and of a pastor who has been ordained and officiates; opens with a neat prayer, closes with a benediction, and invents ritualistic foolery for marriage and christening. It would be laughable if if were not so supremely pitiable. There was a time when the minister of the gospel was master. He named the child, marriage was not legal unless sanctioned by him; he was called at death to furnish a pass to the departing soul to kingdom come—all for the fee that was in it!

Yet a pastor or priest is ordained by a higher priest who receives the indefinable influence of the Holy Ghost from the Pope, who received it as handed down from St. Peter, to whom was given the keys of heaven and hell, as is proven by the well known forged passage in the Bible. This is plain and strictly logical with the Catholics.

The Protestants ignore the power of the Pope, and their laying on of hands is a feeble imitation. Still more dubious the high privilege assumed by a spiritual society, to lay hands on the head of an aspirant, and by ordination set him apart as a special teacher! For clearness of expression and understanding, a few words instead of being given new meanings should be cut out of the spiritual vocabulary. Not only are they obscuring, the ideas they represent have become obsolete.

When these pastors pray, or recite their pretty invocations, the spiritual choir should sing, "Hark, from the tombs a doleful sound," and end with the doxology!

What is the good of it? Must we always express the new thoughts in the garb of old words and phrases?

Must we reiterate like parrots, "Pretty Polly," or, "Polly has a sore toe?"

Oh, we want to be respectable and win the churches!

Win the churches! Do you expect the Pope to declare he is a Spiritualist to-morrow?

If we want to be respected, we shall never gain our desire by constantly apologizing for our belief, or by showing our longing for the fleshpots of the churches we have left, by expressing our belief in the set phraseology they employ. If apology is needed, they are the ones to make it! and I hold them up before the bar of Eternal Justice, to explain and give cause why they should not be sentenced for the horrible doctrines which have racked the souls of untold millions, and made this fair world a pilgrimage of pain.

NO PRIESTHOOD OF MEDIUMS.

If there be one truth most emphatic, it is that Spiritualism has not come to ordain a class of medium priests, to stand between mankind and the truth, as its interpreters. The fountains of light and knowledge of spiritual things is free, and the mystery of godliness no longer broods over an inner temple or a holy of holies, which is forbidden to all except the "ordained." There is not a court in the spirit realm which demands the bowed head of the seeker after knowledge.

The contention whether Spiritualism is a religion or not has been maintained and of late years has become so heated as to threaten a division. Really it all turns on the definition of religion. If the legitimate definition be strictly adhered to, that religion is the forms, ceremonies, and observances in the worship of God, or the gods, Spiritualism cannot be held to be a religion, for it has nothing in common here with any religious system.

Morality has been always held secondary to religion. Morality, and its good deeds count nothing for salvation with an unbeliever. It is constantly taught by gospel ministers that the more moral a man is, the worse his influence unless he believes. Yet with Spiritualism the moral life is as positive a quantity as the intellectual. It follows then that if religion be the aspiration of man for all that ennobles, elevates and spiritualizes, Spiritualism is that religion. Even here, however, it is in opposition to the old beliefs. Man should be moral, that is right in thought and act, not because commanded so to do in a book, but because such is the necessity of his organization; not because of belief, but of knowledge and applying that knowledge to the occurrences of life. Religion is not a science, for science is the classification of demonstrated facts and inferences therefrom, while religion is a matter of belief, founded on miracles. The Spiritualist says I must make every effort for righteousness, not because it is commanded in a book or a creed, but because it is so written in the organization of my being. I must be just, true, magnanimous, charitable, because it is right that I should be so.

Of late years there has been a sort of disintegration of a peculiar type. If converted church members brought old forms after them, others found the name Spiritualism not to their liking and the mysteries of the Orient have been introduced. Many Spiritualists appear to think they will fare better if they call themselves Theosophists; others are pleased with the indefinable term occultists; mediums are able to pass into society as psychics, or to charge exorbitant fees for a little spiritual healing under the name of Mental or Christian Science, and others pass as astrologers.

These cults all draw their vital strength from Spiritualism. Everything of value they receive from this source. They are only parts of its perfect whole.

It reminds me of a story of a sculptor who was cast away on a South Sea island. To amuse himself he carved from snowy coral a beautiful statue, which when rescued he left with the natives.

Some years after he returned with the intention of carrying it away. He found that the natives had broken it in pieces. One had an arm, another a limb, another a fragment of the body, another the head and what was most surprising each claimed that they had the entire statue, or at least all that was valuable, and were filled with hatred against those who had possessed themselves of other parts.

So have the various isms taken parts of the beautiful work of angel hands, and claim they have all that is valuable. They have their following of honest truth seekers, who for the time fail to see that the wider circle of Spiritualism unites them all. These choose to call the rose by another name, but for me I want a name which characterizes that science and philosophy which arises from the foundation of the physical world, to the zenith of the spiritual heavens, taking in matter and spirit; unitizing their diverse manifestations, and I find all this in one word, which I hold to, first, last and forever,

SPIRITUALISM.

What is Spiritualism? Have we a religion, the evolution from preceding systems? A religion cut adrift from the old landmarks and so distinct it requires new definitions? Is it a science or philosophy? I don't think it profitable for us to contend over definitions. Most systems of religion and philosophy are made up of definitions of the terms they use, and after they have laid down terms and phrases, they have no ideas to express with them. They are all terms and definitions like the Chinese language which it takes a lifetime to learn, and then it is so inflexible the student cannot express a new idea.

THE EXTENT OF SPIRITUALISM.

Spiritualism absorbed truths from the Zend Avesta, the Bible of those whose sacred fire blazed from the watch-towers of Babylon; it has been strengthened by the inspired passages of the Shaster, read by priests in the rock temples of the Ganges; it has culled texts from the Book of the Dead, chanted by anointed ones when the pyramids were young, and the lips of Memnon welcomed with song the Sun, Lord of day, rising from the desert beyond the fertile valley; deeply has it drawn from the Hebrew books as explained by Levites standing in the parted curtains of the holy of holies, and from the words recorded by him at whose birth it is said the shepherds on the Syrian plains heard the angels of heaven sing in wondrous carols of joy; it has taken the words of the humble camel driver, whose soul was filled with angel presence, and by this mighty power rose to the leadership of the Moslem race. It stretches across the ages, and embraces all religions. Even the false that is in them all it regards as having a use and purpose, and stepping stones to the truth.

It is all of these and vastly more. These have been content with belief, content to stand on this side the door of spirit life and conjecture what was on the other. Spiritualism gives knowledge for belief; opens wide the door and presents a new and boundless field for investigation.

And what are we who dare to claim title to this exalted name! Immortal spirits for whom this universe was framed! Spirits now, in these garments of flesh; now beginning an endless progress, which, when this earth fades away, the sun no longer shines in the heavens, and the stars break in dust on the coast line of time, will have only begun.

What are we? Beings capable of understanding all; having infinite possibilities in our organization. How is the mathematician able to compute the size, relations and revolutions of worlds; the place they should occupy; the velocity of their motions; their weight in the balance swung out from their central suns? How can he go out across abysses of space, Light, swiftest messenger of nature, is ten thousand years in traversing, and analyze the substance of a blazing star? Because the mathematical laws of the universe are expressed in his organization. How can he comprehend the mysteries of life; the wonders wrought in the invisible cell, the results of the union of countless millions of these cells in a living being; how comprehend the powers of mind and the manifestations of spirit? Because he is a spirit, in whom every element, principle and force of the physical and psychic worlds are blended.

An immortal future is not a reward for belief, but our common heritage, and do you suppose we shall sit down on the heavenly highlands and boast of the accident that made us Methodists or Presbyterians, or agnostics in earth life? All pass through the same gate at last, and all come to an understanding of what it means to be immortal.

If religion be aspiration for righteousness, then this is the religion of religions. It uplifts our souls from the darksome bogs of doubt and fear, into the pure atmosphere of the highlands of a more perfect life. We are a part of all, and as affected by all, it is our duty, and obligation to assist all. As we pass but once this way, we must not let a chance go by of carrying out the precepts of this philosophy of life.

We are centers throwing out vibrations, and we are instruments receiving those which come from others.

A human being is like a ship having a wireless telegraphic instrument, which sends out its vibrations in every direction over the sea, fading into indefinite distance. Any attuned instrument in that wide circle is influenced thereby, and it receives the influences of all others.

All the forces of the universe play on the receptive mind, and the thoughts of all other minds impinge as to a central vortex. We receive, and absorb those to which we are attuned. If the chords of our being are made tense by selfishness and passion, they vibrate responsive to the corresponding waves in the spirit ether. Thus hate intensifies hate, and sensuality is stimulated by sensuality.

But if our minds are attuned to the vibrations of forgiveness and forgetfulness, charity, self devotion, the broad and noble fraternity which places the good of others before our own, then we become responsive to all that is spiritual and uplifting, and like harps under the touch of angel hands.

Here is the explanation of the fact to help ourselves we must help others. We cannot run away from a lagging world, we must carry the world with us. The pain and suffering, the errors and blindness of the world strike our responsive spirits with the jar of discord, nor can we wholly escape, however we may strive, so long as these exist. We cannot so isolate ourselves that the shiverings of the famished, ill-clad, ill-sheltered, do not touch us with unrest. We cannot isolate ourselves, so that the darkened shadows of prison walls do not fall on our innermost spirits.

What are we? To-day incarnate spirits, with possibilities for the realization of our most ardent dreams of perfection. The silent warder death is the usher to an existence when the aspirations of this will be attained.

THUS DO WE FACE TWO WORLDS, the physical and the spiritual, and every thought and act has a double relation; to the present and to the future, and only so far as they contribute to the perfection of the latter are they treasures "laid up in heaven."

We have here a system of knowledge, a science and its explanatory philosophy, which embraces the universe of matter and of spirit. It is the first and only attempt to place all phenomena even to the highest code of morality, and spiritual life and its relations, under the supreme and unchanging rule of law.

It makes of every individual a student, instead of a devotee.

EXALTEDLY CONSCIOUS.

Have you not on some starry night looked above to the silent stars in the illimitable heavens and felt as though you stood on the brink of an unfathomable abyss, with infinite power and glory around you? and yet amidst the loneliness of heart, that you were borne up by a consciousness that you were a spirit as infinite in power and more enduring?

No less inspiring is the view here presented of the position of every human being overshadowed by the grandeur of the spirit world.

Can we claim to be Spiritualists, while our souls are distracted by discords, our minds shadowed by the black clouds of selfishness; our thoughts distorted by the winds of passion? Can we claim to be Spiritualists if we strive not to conform our lives to that of ideal angels?

We may fail at times, we may stumble in rough places, we may fall perchance, but our one aim should be to make ourselves like the spirits we idealize.

Simply to believe that spirit friends return and communicate, does not make one a Spiritualist, no more than learning the alphabet makes a scholar. It is only a short step in that direction. So far as the churches hold aloft the character of Christ in ideal excellence, self-abnegating, forgiving, all-loving, of infinite charity, they are assisting in spiritual advancement, and their example is worthy of imitation.

THE PERFECT MAN

we may not ever see in this life, but I ask you as Spiritualists, is it not an obligation we owe to ourselves and the guardians who bend over us, to make this attainment the chief purpose of living?

Oh, Spiritualism, divinely fair and eloquent of speech, you have brought to famished souls the bread of eternal life; to the thirsting, sparkling water from the fountains of immortality.

You have bound up the broken heart of grief and restored the lost ones who have disappeared in the shadows.

You have made life worth the living and wreathed the couch of death with immortelles.

You hold aloft the highest ideal and assure us it is attainable by the humblest soul.

You have brought the courts of heaven to earth and shown us the way to eliminate the powers of hell.

You have for the old religion of self-depreciation and of pain, brought the religion of joy.

For a tyrant ruler who created and governs for his own pleasure, you have given the reign of law.

For man the debased worm of the dust, you have placed him as the brightest gem in creation's crown.

You have given us the most exalted views of the conduct of life, and transformed the sepulchre to a glorious archway leading to eternal existence.

A CHANGE OF MONITORS.

And How It Resulted in Change of Fortune.

Tom Fentrell and I were schoolmates and great friends. We lived within a few hundred yards of each other, and the greater part of the time when I was not at his house he could be found at mine. He was a bright, cheerful-faced lad, very generous, and as he was always in good humor, he made friends of all with whom he came in contact. His parents died when he was about sixteen and he was adopted by an old uncle and aunt. His foster parents lavished every kindness and care upon him, gave him a good education, and started him on the road of life, well equiped to fight its battles.

Tom's uncle and aunt made him their heir, and when they died they left him twenty-five thousand dollars, and every one predicted for him a brilliant future. He had just turned twenty-one when he came into his patrimony, and from that moment the current of his life changed. Being deprived of the advice and admonition of his uncle and aunt, everything seemed to go contrary to his wishes and expectations. If he made a trade he always got the worst of it; everything with him was always at sixes and sevens. In fact, there was but one thing at which he seemed to succeed, and that was in his pursuit of pleasure, for he certainly got more enjoyment out of life than anyone, despite his otherwise ill luck. But misfortune in all of his financial ventures followed him, and in a few years he found himself penniless, and was compelled to take a clerkship in the business he had once owned. For half a decade he found it difficult to make both ends meet, for in the meantime he had married, and now had a wife and three children to take care of; and then his luck changed, and he prospered in everything he undertook, it mattered not what it might be, whether of a social or financial nature. He soon became one of the wealthiest and most popular men in the county.

One Sunday afternoon, Tom and I took a long walk through the fields and woods, and lived over again the scenes and incidents of our boyhood. It was a lovely summer's afternoon, and we thoroughly enjoyed the tramp. Becoming tired, we sat beneath the overhanging boughs of a mighty oak, and when we had gotten our pipes to going, I said:

"Tom, tell me what caused such a change in your fortune. You were first up and then down. For awhile everything went against you, and then fortune smiled on you benignly, and you prospered as though you were the owner of an Aladdin's lamp. You never seemed to deserve your bad fortune, and I could not see that there was any special credit coming to you for your good luck."

Tom laughed at my thrust, and said, lazily, as he blew a cloud of smoke into the foliage overhead:

"Harry, do you believe in spooks, disembodied spirits, psychic force, or anything of that kind?"

"Not the least in the world," I smilingly replied.

"Well, I do," he volunteered; "but I never put any faith in anything of the kind until a few years ago, and you are the first one to whom I have spoken of my change of ideas. You have often been admonished by what some are pleased to term conscience?—that is if you have any."

We laughed at his getting back on me for the cut I had given him a moment before, and then I replied:

"Yes, I have often heard that still, small voice. But what, pray, has that got to do with psychic force and other such tommy-rot and your change of fortune?"

"A great deal," he answered, seriously. "That still, small voice, in my opinion, is the monitor that God gives you to direct you through this life. It is your good angel, and I believe that good angel is some one who has been near and dear to you on this earth. You may think it only theory, but I believe some of your loved ones who have gone before ask for the joyous and blessed privilege of being constantly with you and directing your thoughts and actions, at least to a great extent. Your monitor may be one of wisdom, and you profit accordingly, and he or she may be the reverse, and you suffer in consequence. My father was one of the best men I ever knew——"

"I agree with you there," I interrupted.

"Well, you know what kind of a manager he was. He always took hold of the wrong end, and never failed to come out of the little end of the horn in everything he undertook. While he was a man of unusual brilliancy and intelligence, he was a philosopher in but one thing—he never worried, and was always in good humor, it mattered not what reverses or misfortune befell him. I have often heard my mother say, which my father affirmed, that if he had taken her advice in business matters he would always have succeeded. And I know now that they were right.

"After my father died, he took the place of my old monitor, whoever that might have been, and almost my every action proved it. If I were in a quandary between business and pleasure, my monitor always told me to let the business alone and go ahead and enjoy myself. If I made a trade I always got the worst of it; and I am firmly convinced that I was guided by my father's wisdom, or rather lack of it. As long as my parents lived I was guided by them jointly, and after their death, Frank and Aunt Fannie were my principal monitors; their will over me being too strong to be opposed by any psychic force. But after uncle and aunt died, my father began to direct my affairs, and you know with what success.

Now, comes the strange part. One night while asleep I had a dream; my subconscious mind was greatly troubled. I saw and heard father and mother talking. Mother said to father, 'Now, Henry, I am in this sphere, and I propose to guide Tom. You know before you crossed over, you could never manage your own affairs successfully, and I know that you will have no happier results with our boy. Leave him with me and he will get along all right.' Father was opposed to giving up his place as my guide, but was finally prevailed upon to do so. And so it was decided between them that in the future my mother should be my monitor. When I awoke in the morning, I felt that a great transformation had taken place within me. I could feel the presence and guiding influence of my mother, and from that moment I had aspirations entirely different from those which had animated my being in the past. The only change that was not made in my life by my new monitor was, that I was allowed to have as much pleasure and enjoyment as ever, so long as it did not conflict with my duty; and for this I felt very thankful, for I would dislike for my desires for enjoyment to have been curtailed. I greatly wished the desire for pleasure, and the opportunity to gratify it. Now, Harry, I guess you will think me a blankety-blank fool for harboring such strange ideas."

"No, I will not," I replied. "I have no right whatever to question your belief in this matter. I know there is some occult force that guides our destinies, but what it is I haven't the least idea; though your position on that question seems as tenable as any that I could advance."

A SPIRITUALIST COLLEGE.

How It Should Differ from Other Colleges.

This theory is only my present opinion. The colleges of to-day differ from those of the past by being more practical. The Spiritualist college would be yet more practical. It would require no examinations of the students on entrance, for some of the unlearned, for our work, might turn out a good deal more valuable than the learned. Also for graduation there would be no examinations. They would go out and stand or fall, as tested by the people. Also it would do away with diplomas, only the world isn't ready for that yet.

In the psychic department there would be an especial branch designed to accentuate individual psychic fitness. It would partake of the moot courts of the law schools, and the feigned practices of the military college. It would strongly emphasize the practical. It would cultivate more of the practical, and less of the academic.

A change in the character of the lyceum would be made. The A. J. Davis form answered for a beginning. At that time the spirits themselves were without experience. It is now proved a failure, only a few faint embers left and these too feeble to be resuscitated. The form lacked character. It was too much after the circus show. It was not calculated for the present advanced demand, which is that amusement shall partake of the mental. The central thought of the new form would be questioning and replies. How eager children are for their friends to tell them stories. Their questions would often develop the profoundest wisdom. Where they would be able, let the children make the replies. The preparation of the teachers would be of the character of the academic with amusement and entertainment added. This form would be building for their after years. The actual Lyceum would not exist in the college, but the clear system would be taught.

An innovation should not be made for the sake of an innovation. Where any old way is good, continue it. Let the Spiritualist college be such in every sense of the word. Have each graduate profoundly instructed in the nature of the continued life and its untold value on this life. Each graduate should have learned the particular work he or she is best adapted to. Give no thought to "mental drill," which other colleges lay so much stress on. By getting useful knowledge, wisdom and understanding, the mental drill will take care of itself. This is an age when the practical rises superior. The world needs more honesty and integrity, more sincerity and true culture; and those who have these will have a pride that will carry them far above the plane of the fakir and the fraud.

Spiritualism has come to the earth many times before, but never permanently. Let us try something now that never was tried before. The whole world should vote Morris Pratt hearty thanks for laying so elegant a foundation for the new departure.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

The statement is made in some of the papal papers that the new "Catholic Federation" is to be used as a "balance of power" in political contests—throwing its vote to the best advantage for popery. This is shrewd and thoroughly Jesuitical. It will give Rome immense power with all political parties, as she can pledge her united vote to each party separately, and be on the winning side always. There is but one antidote for this—and it is for Protestants to organize in such a powerful combination that their strength will be feared, and politicians will not dare to cater to popery. Rome gets her inspiration and her cunning from the old fellow who is an expert, and whose experience dates from the Garden of Eden.—Citizen, Boston.

The use of instrumental musical accompaniment in song is as old as the human race. In the fourth chapter of the Book of Genesis we read that Jubal, a son of Lamech, who was a descendant of Cain, "was the father of them that play upon the harp and the organs."

Max Hoffman is now engaged at work with Unity Society of Milwaukee.

According to the statement of a Presbyterian pastor in New Jersey, bogus doctors of divinity are turned out just as bogus doctors of medicine are, and are supplied with degrees from a diploma factory in Chicago. The pastor says he knows of three such doctors of divinity in his own presbytery, and that the alleged university alluded to makes a practice of canvassing for patrons. He substantiates his statement by publishing correspondence with the "fake" institution, showing that it carries on a regular business in conferring degrees.

Correspondent writes from Lily Dale Camp, N. Y.: "Lily Dale celebrated its 23rd anniversary of the opening of the grounds by a three days' picnic. Prominent, well-known speakers were present, among them Mrs. Carrie Twing, E. W. Sprague and wife, Mrs. Elizabeth Craig, of Waco, Texas; Mr. and Mrs. Noyes, of California, Mrs. Clara Watson, and Mr. and Mrs. Hull. Mr. Gaston, the president of the Lily Dale Association, has spared no pains to make this camp a beautiful spot. This is going to be a banner year; everybody is coming here; the hotels and cottages are filling up earlier than usual."

Burr Chaapel writes: "I desire to learn all possible of the great truths of Nature, yet there are, of course, many conflicting ideas (or standards) set up by as many minds, which block the way to rightful or scientific progress; still, with a firm hope and an iron armour, let us all press forward for the attainment of true spiritual knowledge, found only at the topmost rung and long tedious climbing. Prof. Lockwood, J. S. Loveland and Hudson Tuttle are real lights."

S. E. Jabine writes from California: "The Wanderer" has been highly appreciated, even by my Baptist neighbor. In all things give thanks. The world do move after all."

The unique experience in Paris of watching the earth turn is the treat promised several hundred prominent scientists of France by Camille Flammarion, the noted astronomer and Spiritualist. The invited guests will view the novel sight at the Pantheon. Foucault's memorable experiment to prove the rotation oif the planet is about to be repeated, under the auspices of the French Astronomical society, in connection with the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the original demonstration. Attached to a wire more than seventy-five yards in length, the identical pendulum Foucault used will swing from a point just beneath the top of the dome of Pantheon, marking its various passages across a small circular ring of white sand on the floor beneath the dome. After a quarter of an hour the four-inch ring will be wiped out.

The Wheeling Register, W. Va., says: "The efforts of the society in Wheeling the past year has been crowned with success. From a mere handful of earnest people devoted to their belief, comprising some of the most intelligent people of the city and neighborhood, their numbers have increased largely, and some of the best talent in the country have been brought here regardless of expense and the public has many opportunities to listen to the arguments and tests to prove the immortality of the soul from their standpoint. In no manner were they intended to be antagonistic to any belief or creed when properly understood. The society is in excellent condition for its fall and winter meetings, and has come to stay, and many new interesting features will be announced to the public in due time and the meetings resumed in September next at the Odd Fellows' hall."

Frank N. Foster, spirit photographer, will be at the Jenison Park Camp-Meeting, Michigan.

Mrs. John Lindsey, inspirational lecturer, business and test medium, of Grand Rapids, Mich., is now located in this city, at No. 51 Olga street, where she will hold circles. In her presence spirits speak in audible voices. She is an excellent lady and medium.

Correspondent writes from Lynn, Mass.: "The union meeting held at Unity Camp, on June 15, under the auspices of the Lynn Spiritualists' Association, was very successful, notwithstanding the very disagreeable weather. Visitors were present from many of the surrounding towns. Services were held at 11, 2 and 4. At the 2 o'clock meeting, President Caird briefly outlined the object of the meeting to be, to discuss ways and means by which the interests of Spiritualism in the State might be advanced, and it seemed to be the opinion of most of the speakers that it would be conducive to the good of the cause to form a State Federation of as many of the regularly organized societies as might be induced to join it, for the purpose of holding occasional union meetings, and for whatever other work might seem desirable. Among those who participated in the exercises were Mr. and Mrs. Coggeshall, Mrs. Arthur, Mrs. Bennett, Mrs. Fisher, Mrs. Jones, Mr. Taft, Mr. Fuller, Mrs. Hattie Webber, and Mrs. S. C. Cunningham, who gave some most excellent communications. A concert was held from 3 to 4, which was greatly enjoyed by the large audience present."

The Grand Rapids Herald says: "The experiment was tried from the home of Mrs. Spencer, a medium residing at No. 177 North Union street, on Wednesday evening, May 28. The usual custom at seances is for the spirit to appear in voice only and by the aid of a trumpet talk to the person courting the interview, but in this case many adherents of the faith who were present testify that a spirit from the unseen world held a trumpet to the telephone and talked to a person who was expectantly listening at the other end of the line. The telephone connection had been established with a telephone at No. 97 Sheldon street. The mother of the young man whose spirit is alleged to have done the talking was sitting in the circle at Mrs. Spencer's and says she is positive that she heard her son's voice. The conversation by wire had been previously arranged with the spirit who so kindly contributed to the test and on being asked prior to the experimenting if he thought it possible for him to talk loud enough for the conversation to be heard over the telephone, he replied that he could make his voice as discernible to the person listening at the end of the line as the people sitting in the circle. He also expressed his pleasure at being allowed to talk by telephone, and said he was enjoying himself very much in the spirit world. The people who witnessed the singular occurrence were highly elated over the success of the experiment and state their determination to make other tests of a like nature soon."

Platform test mediums of acknowledged ability, having open dates from September 1, 1902, to June 1, 1903, who may desire engagements in New York City, are invited to address the undersigned. Mediums whose powers will not enable them to meet strictly test conditions in public, need not reply. We want quality of work, not quantity. State full particulars regarding phase of mediumship, terms, open dates, etc. Fortune tellers, card sharpers, fakirs, gamblers, and those whose private lives are a disgrace to the cause, are not wanted. Address John D. Taucher, secretary, general delivery, New York.

Kiichi Kaneko says in the Metaphysical Magazine: "Again, I do not understand why the people read the Bible so much and always look back to Jesus. The Bible is only an imperfect religious history of the Israelites. If it is the word of God, it is the word through Israelites as the word is in Confucianism through the Chinese. The Bible is nothing more than Confucius' or Buddha's books. God in the Bible is the God of Israel, but not the God of the universe. Suppose the Bible were destroyed, would men then lose all faith in God? No, never. But remember, as long as people cling to the Bible, their God is not the God of the universe. As long as the people only go back to Christ and claim to be Christians, the world will never make genuine progress. Jesus was not the only great soul of the world. If you compare his teachings with those of Confucius and Buddha you may easily find the same value in them and sometimes a far greater value. Confucius lived and died about 550 years before Christ. He said, 'What you do not want done to yourself, do not do to others.' Six hundred years after, Christ repeated the same idea in a positive and I should say a better way, 'All things whatsoever ye would that men should do unto you, do ye even so to them.' In the fifth century before Christ, Buddha of India said, 'Let us live happily then, not hating those who hate us; among men who hate us let us dwell free from hatred.' Five hundred years later Christ says, 'Love your enemies; bless them that curse you; do good to them that hate you; and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you.'"

W. L. Gould writes from Dallas, Tex.: "Mrs. Georgia G. Cooley has come and gone, and what an intellectual treat we have enjoyed. The hot, sultry weather prevented many from attending her meetings, but notwithstanding this they were well attended, and among them many investigators. Here she has sown the seed that grows and blooms into light and truth, among a class that our platform speakers are unable to reach. While here every day and evening was used in her missionary work, and the conscientious manner in which she entered in this work has made for her lasting friends, and there goes out to her many good thoughts for her in her good work, prosperity and happiness."

Mrs. Elizabeth Demorest, of Chicago, writes: "After a short and very happy visit with my daughter, Mrs. K. M. Riley, and her husband at their North Side home, I am about to depart from your most wonderfully busy city, carrying with me pleasant memories and associations with old friends and Spiritualists of whom I had the pleasure of meeting at the Band of Harmony, which is well named, and other societies that I have visited. My field of labor for our progressive cause first takes me to my home in Pittsburg; then to Williamsport, and Reading, Pa., Ohio and West Virginia, and then to breathe in God's inspiration divine, I turn my footsteps to sweet Lily Dale, trusting your most valuable paper will reach me safely in my travels."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

A. C. Doane writes: "I have taken much interest in the letters written by Prof. William Denton through the mediumship of Carlyle Petersilea. I consider them genuine truths, uttered by an honest spirit, through an honest man, on a subject that will soon agitate the political and so-called Christian world. We are nearing a time in the world that calls for a change in civilization, and whatever stands in the way of its coming will have to get out of the way. It is not the decree of any personal God that is causing the change, but the combined force of unfolded intelligences, that were once persecuted on earth as heretics, that are coming to answer the prayers of the downtrodden children of earth."

Dispatches from Rome report that five cardinals have been named by the Pope to enter into negotiations with Governor Taft concerning the friar question. They will hold their first meeting Tuesday and give a written opinion to his holiness Wednesday on the general character of the American propositions. It then remains to be seen whether the Pope will entertain those propositions, and if he decides to do so the problem may be considered almost as good as solved already. For of all the difficulties to be considered this initial one is the greatest because of the conditions exacted by Governor Taft's instructions. In these the withdrawal of the friars is insisted upon as an indispensable concession. It is the supreme aim of the negotiations to which all the others are merely accessory, being resolved into so many business deals, including the purchase of lands, the payment of an indemnity for the occupation of buildings, the settlement of trusts over which there is some conflict between the ecclesiastical and the civil authorities. These various subjects may all require considerable debate before an arrangement can be reached, but if the one imperative condition precedent is allowed subsequent delays over the details will be of comparatively small importance.

H. W. Miller writes: "After a season of success the Progressive Spiritual Church will close Sunday, June 29, for the summer. The pastor, Mr. G. V. Cordingly, has been an untiring worker in the cause of Spiritualism, and his success is well merited for his labor. The closing of his church at Handel Hall does not signify a rest for the summer. He simply means to transfer his services to the Illinois State Spiritualist Camp at Belmore Park. During the past season he has been ably assisted by Mrs. Maggie Waite, Dr. J. H. Randall, Mr. V. Hunt, Mrs. Prescilla Baldwin, Dr. L. H. Freedman, Mr. Samuel Foss, Mrs. Demorest, Mrs. Riley, Mr. Peterson and others. On Saturday, June 7, was held the twelfth annual Indian pow-wow, which is yearly looked forward to with much interest. In spite of the terrible downpour of rain, over three hundred persons passed the gate. Many came especially to hear the wonderful prophecies of Chief Red Jacket. Those who attended the pow-wow of last year can testify as to the accuracy of his predictions regarding national events, weather, etc. Mr. Cordingly will open service for the fall and winter, Sunday, September 21, 1902."

F. W. DeTray writes: "There will be a picnic given by the Church of the Soul, on Saturday, June 28, at Glencoe, Ill. We have chartered a coach over the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad. Train leaves Wells Street Depot at 10:30 a. m.; leaves Glencoe to return at 7 p. m. Fare for round trip 50 cents for adults. Come and enjoy an outing."

W. E. T. writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "In your issue of June 21, my attention was called to the article, 'Do We Need a Bible?' by Will C. Hodge, and as I am a new convert to the cause, I presume I feel the need of further light upon this most important subject, as many others do that have began investigating, and in the face of the fact that the belief in Modern Spiritualism is growing very fast, the need of some guide or book of instructions is becoming a necessity, call it what you may. I would suggest the name of 'The Spiritual Bible,' and let it be so arranged that all could understand the general principles underlying Modern Spiritualism. I believe a book of this kind would not only be welcomed by all Spiritualists, but would be a step further in this grand cause. The trouble is, we are not united, and should look forward to the establishing of churches and schools for instruction and knowledge."

Mrs. M. A. McLillan, 522 Elk street, Dunkirk, N. Y., wishes a lady companion. She writes: "I can give a very comfortable home and good treatment; work very light; all modern conveniences and a very pleasant location. In fact, this is a good chance for a woman who would appreciate a good home more than large wages. Our city is only nine miles from Lily Dale Camp. I would like a woman interested in the spiritual philosophy, so as to be companionable."

Miss Gertrude Spooner, secretary of the Western Wisconsin Camp Association, writes from Wonewoc, Wis.: "The programme for this camp is now complete, and the printed announcements ready for distribution. A programme of the highest order has been arranged, with the following well known talent in attendance at the camp: Moses and Mattie Hull, Mrs. Catherine McFarlin, Mrs. Edna Ford-Pierce, Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, J. S. Maxwell, Will J. Erwood, Francis Wheeler, Ella Johnson Bloom, Alice Wickstrom, and Dr. Nellie Mosier. This presents one of the strongest programmes ever offered at a sixteen-day camp, and visitors are assured of the very best in phenomena and philosophy. Besides the above mentioned workers, Mr. and Mrs. Buchanan, the well-known slate and letter writing mediums, of Clinton, Iowa, and Mrs. N. M. Hardy, medium for materialization, who comes to our camp highly recommended, will be in attendance during the entire camp. The camp runs from the 12th of July to the 28th of July, inclusive of both dates. Write for programmes and general information, and come and join us in having a rare treat."

Alfred Curtis writes: "The Progressive Spiritual Society will hold its closing services on Sunday, June 29, at North avenue and Burling street, reopening again on Sunday, September 7, in the same hall."

Mrs. Thirza Rathbun writes from California: "The premium book by Hudson Tuttle has been received. From what we have read of it, we can see it is indeed a valuable addition to Spiritualistic literature, and we send you many thanks for it."

R. F. Ring writes from Galveston, Tex.: "The letters from spirit William Denton are worth the price of the paper. The bottom ought to have been knocked out of hell ages ago and man taught to do right; not that he could sin during life, and then after death put the same on poor Jesus, who suffered for sins before they were committed, as taught by the church."

J. N. Parker's name appeared in The Progressive Thinker as J. N. Broctor—a mistake.

Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie, of San Francisco, Cal., is stopping at 4812 Greenwood avenue, during her stay in Chicago, previous to attending camp. She has some open dates during the summer, and will be glad to answer calls for camp work and lectures. She will open Lake Brady camp, July 13, and be at Chesterfield, August 3. Mrs. Gillespie has been doing an excellent work in California, and she should be kept constantly employed during her short visit in the East.

E. W. Sprague has just published, in pamphlet form, a reply to a sermon preached against Spiritualism, by Rev. T. J. Freed, pastor of the Christian (Campbellite) church of Remington, Ind., together with "Twenty Important Questions for the Clergy to Answer." Send ten cents (silver or stamps) to E. W. Sprague, 618 Newland Avenue, Jamestown, N. Y., and you will receive a copy by return mail.

Carrie E. S. Twing will be at the Lily Dale camp the first two weeks of the meeting. Besides being on the platform three times she is to assist the Woman's Auxiliary in its work. She next goes to Onset, then to Sunapee Lake, N. H., then to Lake Pleasant, then to Maine to serve three camps. Her camp work closes the 14th of September.

Captain George W. Walrond, of Denver, Colorado, the well-known inspirational lecturer and test medium, will make a professional tour of the states of Colorado, Utah, Nebraska, Wyoming, New Mexico, Nevada, Oregon, Washington, Montana and California, calling at all of the principal cities and towns in these states. Those desiring his services for public or private work, should write him at once, as he is making dates and arrangements to begin early in July. Letters and applications must be addressed to Captain Geo. W. Walrond, 1724 Ogden street, Denver, Colo. His book trade will be carried on at that address.

F. M. Norton writes from San Diego, Cal.: "An article appeared in The Progressive Thinker regarding certain experiences, in the production of physical life by artificial means, brings to mind a communication through Dr. Herbert Nason, of your city, something like 25 years since, published under the title of 'Pre-Historic Man.' The writer was one of twelve who formed the battery which held the forces that wrote through the Doctor's hand in ancient Sanscrit, and afterwards translated by Dr. Cooper of Belfontaine, O. I understand that the wisdom-spirits, or creators of this planet understood how to combine the required chemicals, and also the external environments necessary, for the production of human beings. It has never since that time been beyond the power of man to rise to the height of similar knowledge. It would seem a logical conclusion that man being a ray reflected from the Central Source of the now manifested universe, existing here for his individual and collective progress, back to his divine source, must eventually reach that degree of wisdom which belonged to that stage of progress or unfoldment of the Omniscience, by slow and hard-earned steps. Yes, it is a long step, from the sea-urchin to even the lowest form of man; but all things are possible with God; the god in man. I would like to recall the statements in Nason's book to those who scoffed at them; in view of the presentation of the facts in the realm of realism, along the lines of investigation."

Elijah F. Rice writes from Kalamazoo, Mich.: "Your Divine Plan of almost giving away so many splendid premium books for the trifling sum of one dollar for one year's subscription to The Progressive Thinker and twenty-five cents for a premium book, is beyond my comprehension as to how you can afford to do so; and that reminds me that my present subscription is nearly out, and that I must remit my pittance for the continuance of the paper. Old age is creeping apace. I am nearing my 82nd birthday. I have been an honest investigator of the phenomena and philosophy and science of Spiritualism since Nov. 1862."

Mrs. E. C. Hunn writes: "Our cause is gaining ground here. We hold circles every week and are trying to build up a society in this city. Dr. H. C. Andrews has been in our home for two months, stricken down with dropsy. He is gaining slowly but is in need of financial aid. He is a good medium, and has done much good work in promulgating Spiritualism. We hope his friends in different places will respond and send what they can to help him in his hour of need. I am his sister, and doing my best with a good clairvoyant physician to restore him to health. Any sums of money will be thankfully received if sent to my address, R. F. D. No. 5, Saginaw, Mich."

Mrs. M. L. Elliott writes: "The last premium, is a grand, good book, and right here I wish to say what little knowledge I possess has been gleaned from The Progressive Thinker and the premium books. Last winter I read Rending the Vail, and what a lot of comfort I gleaned from that book. I am forming a Spiritualist library, thanks to you who gave me the idea. Now I always have something to read at home."

Oakland, Cal., has trouble brewing for mediums. The city fathers, in their ignorance of the decisions of the Superior Court, have just added a new section to the ordinance, to be known as "Sec. 41," which was published in the Oakland Enquirer of June 7. It reads thus: "For every astrologer, seer, fortune-teller, palmist, clairvoyant, Spiritualist or spiritual medium, who demands a fee for his or her services, or gives an exhibition at any place where an admission fee is charged, the license shall be $5 a week, $15 a month, or $30 per quarter." Is it not strange that these city officials should not have heard of the decision of the Superior Court which has interpreted the law, and decided that such an ordinance is unconstitutional and entirely void? Those interested in Oakland should dose every member of the city council, the mayor and city attorney with copies of the decision of Judge Smith.—Philosophical Journal.

J. C. Norwood writes from Standard, Fla.: "I noticed that one of the last things the Southern Presbyterians did who had been holding a convention in Mississippi a month ago, was to petition Congress not to publish 'Thos Jefferson's History of Christ.' This was an eye-opener to me, and I have seen no comment nor explanation in any newspaper, with one exception, which I enclose. It is as follows: 'Among his other voluminous writings Thomas Jefferson wrote a life of Christ. It was entitled 'Life and Morals of Jesus of Nazareth,' and was made up entirely of clippings from the Bible. In some verses he used clippings from all the gospels of Matthew, Mark, Luke and John. The original was purchased by the government for $400 and deposited in the Smithsonian Institution, where it has been forgotten for years. It was discovered recently and Congress has adopted a joint resolution providing for printing five thousand copies, and Dr. Cyrus Adler has been authorized to write an introduction for it. In the 'Jefferson Bible' all miracles and everything pertaining to the supernatural has been eliminated.'"

John Wallace writes from Andover, Ohio: "Doctor O. W. Knowles, of Grand Rapids, Mich., is spending a couple of weeks here on a special mission; he is treating some patients here will satisfactory results. He will serve the society at Geneva, O., on Sunday, the 22d. He will deliver two lectures, morning and afternoon, following his lectures with tests. As a test medium he is considered very valuable. He is engaged to lecture and give tests at the Grove meeting to be held in Kingsville, O., on the 29th. The other speakers we understand will be D. A. Herrick and Carrie E. S. Twing."

Hon Alonzo Thompson, of Nebraska, was in the city a few days ago, on his way to the Morris Pratt Institute. He is a level-headed man, and what he does, is well done.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley passed through the city last week, on her way to the Clinton Camp.

Titus Merritt writes: "The First Association of New York closed their meeting May 25. Miss Margaret Gaule's ministrations have been eminently successful with this society the past season. She decided to continue her work in the glorious cause through the Sundays of June. The weather has been very favorable, and there has been a large attendance. Miss Gaule's mother, a resident of Baltimore, Md., who has been an invalid for years, under the loving care of her daughter, passed to spirit realms, June 17. This society commenced Jan. 4, 1863. It has been peculiar in this respect, that while the average attendance has been nearly the same, 150 to 200, there is a constant change of persons, and this season fully 80 per cent have been strangers and new investigators. Up to 1897 we had lectures, morning and evening. In that year there was such a demand for phenomena that the ablest speaker could not command an audience; but it brought a large attendance at 25 cents admission, consequently at the session commencing October 1898, the society abandoned the morning meeting and held meetings at 3 and 8 p.m. With Miss Gaule as test medium, and Mr. M. A. Newton, president, and a good business woman as secretary and treasurer, we have had no trouble in keeping out of debt."

Mrs. Allie Perkins writes: "Mr. Jessup and Mrs. Gehring were able to return to Frankfort, Ind., and further demonstrate their great mediumistic power, in spite of the so-called flashlight revelation of their fraudulent work here."

Correspondent writes, indicating that Lake Brady is played out as a Spiritualist camp: "I, like Nellie C. Mosier, like to have matters set right so that we can know "where we are at." Lake Brady Spiritualist camp-ground has passed into the hands of a company that is making it an attractive summer resort. Spiritualists have nothing to do with it whatever; but a few hopeful Spiritualists have leased a few acres, adjacent to the old grounds, with a nice little grove; a small old farm house and barn is all there is to show at this writing toward having a camp-meeting in the very near future; no lake privilege whatever; still it goes out to the world that Lake Brady is still running a camp as usual, which isn't true."

Mrs. John Lindsey writes: "Mr. and Mrs. Conklin, of 51 Olga street, Chicago, held their wedding anniversary of thirty years, Thursday evening, June 19—pretty repetition of the first marriage, the bride being re-given in marriage to her faithful groom and husband, by her aged father, Nelson Kirby. The bride was attired becomingly in pure white; wore flowers in her hair and carried a large bunch of roses. The repeating of the marriage ceremony, very impressively, was given by Mrs. J. Lindsey, of Grand Rapids, Mich. The wedding march was played by the daughter, after which followed a merry promenade, and all partook of refreshments. The presenting of a large bouquet of roses and carnations was given by Mrs. Lindsey. The evening passed off in the most enjoyable way, all wishing the happy couple congratulations and prosperity for thirty years more of married life."

D. W. Hull will lecture at Caldwell, Idaho, June 27 to July 3; at the New Era, Ore., camp-meeting, July 5 to 21; at Etna, (Wash) camp-meeting, August 9 to 23. He is desirous of filling the open dates between these two camp-meetings. Address him at New Era, Oregon.

Baron von Humboldt.

To the Editor:—Through the courtesy of a friend, I am indebted for the loan of Wm. W. Aber's book entitled "Rending the Vail," from which I make some extracts. Baron von Humboldt, whose return to earth should astonish no one, says, page 402:

"In looking around, I see your country is going down, down towards bankruptcy; and do you know that, without some wise statesmanship, it will soon be there? You are on the verge of a financial crisis; if not by wisdom averted, it will shake your nation as it has never been shaken since its founding.

"We, as spirits, can modify the calamity, but influences are now at work that will cause the world to tremble on its Titanic foundations.

"You speak of smart men. Such you have had to guide your ship of state, but they are gone. Instead of smart men, you now have selfish men, working not for you, but for themselves, for the few rich, to the enslavement of the many.

"Your smartest men, that are gone, come not back, except in spirit. Whenever you lose one of them to earthlife, it is better for you, because they can do more good for the world from the spirit side than they could from the mortal side.

"Than Baron von Humboldt your earth never produced a grander soul. He gathered from all sources, from all the ages. He has his great garnerings with him here in eternal life, of which he can now and for the coming ages dispense to the needy, to the hungering, and thereby feed the famishing; and the very act of so giving, instead of depleting, increases the treasures of his own garners.

"Other great minds who have gathered on earth are continually ascending to spirit life glittering all over with their accumulated jewels, which on earth were not utilized; but now, for the benefit of themselves and the soul-hungry, sentient beings of earth and sky—and their stores eternally increasing.

"These are they who were not using their entire earth lives trying to make fortunes out of somebody else.

"These are they who in reality make your inventions of to-day, as some time you will know. But they make them for the benefit of man, not for the sole benefit of financial slave-drivers, backed up by hireling legislative, judicial, and administrative departments."

Baron von Humboldt.

Lake Pleasant, Mass., Camp-meeting, Aug. 3 to 31.

The chief attraction in the line of vocal music will be the singing of the Ladies' Schubert Quartette, of Boston. The quartette will arrive on the grounds, August 2, and will remain till the close of the session. They will sing at all the meetings mentioned in the program, and will give a special benefit concert about August 20. The reputation of these excellent musical artists is unrivalled in Boston, and in many other cities in the east where they have sung. At Lake Pleasant in former years they have been very popular, and no doubt with a new and classical repertoire of music, they will fully meet the anticipations of thousands of lovers of good singing.

The campers and thousands of visitors to this healthful and beautiful place will enjoy as of old, the band music provided by the management. Every Sunday a fine military band of twenty-five men will give public concerts.

There will be dances at the pavilion or temple on week evenings—a competent orchestra having been engaged to furnish the music.

Now that electric cars run from Greenfield, Turners Falls and Millers Falls, the dancing people in those localities will have every facility for coming to the dances and of returning at a reasonable hour.

The Boston and Maine R. R. will run excursion trains to the Lake, if sufficient patronage is secured.

Those wishing to obtain programs or to secure furnished cottages or rooms in advance, should write (enclosing stamp) to A. P. Blinn, clerk, at Lake Pleasant, Mass.

Prominent Spiritualist Passed On.

Jay Chaapel passed to the broader and more beautiful life, from Palmetto, Fla., May 29, aged 73 years. He was an ardent Spiritualist, and an earnest worker in every line of reform. He was a well-known anti-slavery man in the past, and a friend of the working people always. He spent several seasons at Sunapee Lake, N. H., camp-meeting, where he has many friends. It is to be hoped that some of the productions of his pen may be given to the public, as he was a student and a thinker. In touch with nature and a natural psychic, he gloried in the beautiful. His wonderful memory enabled him to keep in touch with the history of the past and in line with the events of the present. He was as fearless in his denunciation of what he considered wrong as he was in praise of what he deemed right. His illness was of short duration. He passed away at a friend's, after having packed his belongings to go to Lake Helen, Fla., where he expected to build a home in the autumn, but was to have spent the summer in the North. He leaves one daughter, Miss Belle, and two sons, Ralph, of Granville, and Harry, of Williamsport, Pa. Sarah Kemble Hart, of Belleview, Fla., officiated at the funeral there, and the memorial service at the home of the daughter was conducted by the writer.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

Hector Waylen, Blackpool, England: Q. Have your spirit authors written anything farther than what they say in your Philosophy of Spirit, as follows:

A spirit can, "by a course of debauchery, gluttony, lust and crime annul its charter to immortal life and gradually fade into oblivion?"

A. This correspondent has in a valuable article contributed to The Two Worlds, given an exhaustive review of the opinions of wise men and belief of the people in past times, and concludes by saying that at the circle he attends the spirit intelligences teach the same view, that a spirit may annul its charter of continued existence. Some of his quotations are of great interest and profound significance.

Stainton Moses wrote of "the miserable, abandoned spirits who sink down deeper and deeper, who become unable to rise and who gradually lose their personality"—"in the end they die the final death," that is, "the second death of which we read in the Book of Revelations."

He takes the text "The soul that sinneth, it shall die." The idea is shadowed in the Babylonian tradition of the Garden of Eden. The reason given why man was driven forth from its gates was "lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life and live forever."

The Egyptian "Book of the Dead" has descriptions of the fate of the wicked as that of the "second death." This statement that spiritual beings were not necessarily immortal, pervades all the writings which have been given me, and is an inevitable corollary of the principle of evolution of spirit therein advocated. It is to be remarked that it is not a question of wickedness or sin, but of development. The sinful soul is an undeveloped soul, but the undeveloped may not be sinful. The occasion, the temptation, the impulse may have been wanting. In my publication, "Studies in Psychic Science," it is affirmed that because a spirit exists after the death of its physical body, is not demonstration that it will live forever. If that existence is maintained, a certain point in evolution must be reached. The comparison is made to an arch, in constructing which a scaffolding is erected for its support. If the arch is completed, the keystone in place, the support may be removed, and the arch be stronger. But if not completed, if the scaffolding fail, the whole falls in ruins.

So the physical body is the support of the spiritual, and if that spiritual being has not reached in its evolutionary advance a certain completeness, it cannot maintain its individuality after the physical body has been removed. Possibly, even after reaching this point, a career of vice or yielding to the lower wants and animal faculties may annul the possibilities of the spirit.

An individual, having no desire for a future life, or comprehension of it; who lives for gratification of self; who wrongs others for a pastime, and enjoys suffering, not being spiritual may find that as in the evolution of physical forms, the imperfect are doomed to perish so it is in the spiritual.

The second death may come from which there is no resurrection. As with the physical being, a deficient, partially-aborted form may by intelligent care become of the strongest and most perfect, so one may be led to that perfect completeness of being which assures eternal continuance.

To the advocate of law and evolution in the realm of spirit, this question has more than speculative interest. It must be met, not by theological cant, but by demonstration. While I have no desire to meet it other than squarely as we must if we assume the position that it is our right to know, I by no means gloss the difficulties which meet us in our attempts to prove the proposition. Essentially it at present rests on the words of those intelligences who have returned with messages, although cumulative evidence is derived from the continuance of the process of evolution from the physical to the spiritual being.

Nor can we close our eyes to the tremendous consequences which flow from it. When, even, the spirit of civilized man may tremble in the balance and be found wanting, how can it be maintained, that animals, or that savage races, whose whole lives are made up of a series of crimes, and who delight in inflicting suffering, have immortal existence?

"A New Convert": Q. Is there danger in Spiritualism?

A. There is, and there is not.

To those who preserve an even, harmonious life; who maintain their selfhood and thus surround themselves with an atmosphere of love, sympathy and intelligence; who take spiritual control and communications at their true value, there is no danger. To such only good can come. To those who enter the circle with overweening desire to be controlled, without regard to the character of the control, and are filled with the infatuation of a "mission," and going forth to reform the world; there is danger, great danger, of their becoming controlled by spirits ignorant as themselves, or falling into a self-suggesting, hypnotic state, in which their own dominant ideas are mistaken for spirit control. Manifestations and communications received under such conditions bring ridicule and reproach, and discouragement and shame to those who have the welfare of the cause at heart. It may terminate in so-called obsession, which in nine cases out of ten is the yielding of the will to the desires; a revelation of the real character free from restraint.

There is always danger in surrendering selfhood, whether to a mortal or a spirit. It is a most deplorable act to become a puppet in the hands of the highest. Such mediums receive messages from the earth's most distinguished dead, written in one style of dreary common-place with disgusting pretensions.

Washington, Lincoln, Franklin and like illustrious names are freely used, and no common-place spirit is tolerated. Great names are more attractive to vanity than sense, and I have heard of mediums who were under the direct control of the Bible Jehovah! If such messages are spiritual they are from the lowest, deceiving, and unreliable sources. Messages from Jesus Christ, not such as he would write, but such as ignorant cunning thinks he would write; the most common-place drivel ought to convince the receivers that such messages bear the unmistakable character of fraud, and are a disgrace to the cause that ever gives them passing notice.

Mattie W. Howard: The passage from Victor Hugo, which has been quoted to show his belief in Spiritualism: "To abandon these spiritual phenomena to credulity, is to commit treason against human reason. Nevertheless we see them always rejected, always reappearing. They date not their advent from yesterday." An English translation of Hugo's work on Shakspeare has been issued by McClurg & Co., Chicago, in two editions, one at $1.50 and the other at $4.00.

News From Portage, Wis.

Please allow me a short space to explain myself in regard to your paper, and in regard to the book entitled "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands." I consider your paper the best that is edited in this country. It contains more spiritual news than any other paper, and also biblical and historical facts that we do not get in any other paper; and when one once takes it he doesn't want to be without it, and anxiously looks for it each week.

The book referred to is of much interest to me, and contains much that I am satisfied is true, as I have read from three different sources a description of the other life or spiritual life. One I received written through myself automatically, from my daughter, in which she says, in answer to her mother's question, the spiritual life where she is is much like it is in earth life; that they have spiritual houses to live in and everything appertaining thereto in the household as we have in earth life, only spiritual.

She says, "but you cannot understand it, mamma, it is all spiritual." Oh that more could understand what is before them, their earth life would be much different and better than it is. Referring to a portion of what is contained in the book referred to, my guides said long ago, there is no escape from punishment for those that deserve it in the life to come.

The knowledge of communication from the other side of life has been of great comfort to thousands, and there are more every day realizing the fact that there is no death, and that there is a way of receiving messages from those that have gone from our sight.

We have recently organized a society or club here in Portage, with Mrs. Nellie K. Baker as president. There has been of late much interest shown on account of the spiritual meetings we have held here with Mrs. Baker as speaker, and her lectures I consider are among the best that are delivered from any spiritual platform.

THE ORTHODOX MINISTER'S PRAYER.

Oh, Thou, who art the source of all eternal truth and right,
In humble supplication we praise thy name and might;
Bend thine ear, oh, Thou who art the adored one,
While we plead with Father, Holy Ghost and Son.
Oh, Thou who art the Great I Am, who
doeth all things well,
Whom it pleases to send one to heaven,
and thousands to hell,
All for thy glory, may thy holy presence ever blend
With ours, and all praise shall be thine, even unto the end.

And, oh! thou dear Lord, 'tis perfectly plain to see,
That thou didst in thy wrath visit
Mount Pelee,
And did strike with dumb terror, and with mighty blow
Thy children to eternal depths of hell below.
Let not, oh, Lord, thy glory ever fade away,
But abide within my heart and soul day
by day.
Give me grace, oh, Lord, within thy fold let me forever be.
Give us strength and power to convert the Heathen Chinee.

Oh, Thou who dost rule the earth and firmament,
To thee, oh, Lord, our hopes, our prayers are ever sent;
Give unto us grace from which all blessings flow.
Direct, dear Lord, the bullet that slays
the Filipino.
Kind Father, the war of extermination with sword and flame
Throughout christendom is being done,
dear one, in thy holy name.
We realize that thy banner throughout the world ever soars
While we shoot the dark skins, and the British enslave the Boers.

Let our songs and prayers ascend to thee around the great white throne.
We praise thee, Lord, for the rescue of our dear Sister Ellen Stone.
To your dear children, Lord, thy ways
and laws are no riddle,
For we love the strains that were played on Nero's fiddle.
In times of trouble and despair, and on darkest night
Thy people buckle on the armor, and march out to fight,
To vindicate thy cause, and punish,
worlds without end,
For we all would have thy will be done,
dear Lord, Amen.

LITERARY CRITICISM.

The Bacon-Shaksper Controversy.

I have been a convert to the Baconian authorship of Shakespeare since 1872. In 1886 I published a pamphlet entitled "Bacon and Shakspere—Proof that William Shakspere Could Not Write," etc. I reproduced the five signatures of Shaksper and analyzed them letter by letter to show the man's illiteracy. My fac similes of the autographs have been extensively copied, and recently, in a book entitled "Shaksper not Shakespeare," the author, W. H. Edwards, has demonstrated that in all the five signatures the spelling is S-h-a-k-s-p-e-r or Shakspar. The one autograph which appears to have a final e is ascertained to have the German script form of the terminal letter r, which is like our w tilted up at the left, and is still in use by Germans. I found it in "Woodbury's Method of Learning the German Language," published more than fifty years ago. When I discovered it I wrote to Mr. Edwards about it, he then being about to publish his book. He borrowed my book and reproduced its German script r. It was a clincher to the spelling S-h-a-k-s-p-e-r.

Mr. Edwards went further and proved that in Shaksper's time it was not necessary for the maker of a deed or will or other legal paper to sign it with his own hand. A lawyer's clerk or any one else could do it.

The seal was essential, but not the maker's own autograph. And the remarkable variation in the five signatures showed quite conclusively that one hand did not write them all. Hence Mr. Edwards inferred that most of the five signatures were not written by William Shaksper, and that he probably write only the second and the fifth, and possibly only the final name in the latter, which reads "By me William Shaksp," with the terminal letters illegible.

Thus it appears that the man's ability to write is measured by the clumsy formation of the thirteen lettters of the alphabet contained in the words, "By me William Shaksper." There is no evidence that he wrote anything besides the five signatures, or some part of them.

I am not aware that any one has ever attempted to refute this evidence of Shaksper's illiteracy.

The anti-Baconian disputants have generally exhibited bad temper. The latest example thereof is by William J. Rolfe A. M., Litt. D., of Cambridge, in a two-column article published in the Boston Sunday Globe. He denies that the author of the plays ascribed to Shakespeare was "a man of most profound and varied scholarship." He asserts that such a notion is of modern date. Conceding this to be a fact, for argument's sake, I now quote from James Parton's "Life of Voltaire":

"Voltaire had discovered Shakespeare; but only as Columbus discovered America, without knowing what he had found. Pierre le Tourneur was the Frenchman who discerned the continental vastness and inexhaustible value of Voltaire's discovery. He found Shakespeare to be 'the sovereign genius of the stage.' His translation, in which he had the assistance of eminent scholars, ran to twenty volumes.... The success of the translation was a result of that fashionable taste for everything English which prevailed in France until the American war turned the current of feeling the other way. Voltaire had originated that taste. His countrymen had taken him at his word; and now, in his old age, he saw his beloved Racine, his august Corneille, his universal Moliere, and himself pushed rudely from their pedestals, and 'a gifted barbarian' exalted in their stead, as the one master of dramatic art.

"'Have you read the two volumes of this wretch,' he asks D'Argental, 'in which he calls Shakespeare the god of the stage? He sacrifices all the French without exception to his idol, as pigs were formerly sacrificed to Ceres! The blood boils in my old veins. Little did I foresee that I should serve one day to crush under foot the crowns of Corneille and Racine, in order to adorn with one the brows of a barbarian actor.'"

Commenting upon this most blind and perverse criticism," Mr. Parton adds: "The force of perversity can go no further. But, I repeat, very "much in the same way the polite classes of England judged Shakespeare for a hundred and fifty years."

If Mr. Parton were living now he would have seen in the Boston Sunday Globe the same "blind and perverse criticism" by a professor of Cambridge University.

But to illustrate the bad temper of the critic of Cambridge, he quotes from Mrs. Constance M. Pott a passage concerning Shakespeare's women as follows:

"We see that Bacon formed very unfavorable views regarding them, views which unhappily passages in his own life probably tended to confirm. The Shakespeare plays seem to exhibit the same unfavorable sentiments of their author."

Professor Rolfe then remarks:

"The lady proceeds to classify the 130 female characters in the plays thus: '(1) furies or viragoes; (2) shrews and sharp-tongued women; (3) gossiping and untrustworthy; (4) fickle, faithless and artful—assumed throughout the plays to be the normal condition of womanhood; (5) thoroughly immoral; (6) gentle, simple and colorless.' She adds: 'Noteworthy exceptions are Isabella, Volumnia and Katherine of Aragon, but these are not sufficient to do away with the impression that on the whole the author of the plays had but a poor opinion of women. Love he regarded as a youthful passion, marriage as a doubtful happiness.'"

Now for the crushing criticism of the literary doctor of Cambridge; he says:

"I think that on the whole this is, without exception, the falsest, grossest, meanest and most atrocious libel upon Shakespeare that was ever written; but Mrs. Pott is driven to it by her recognition of Bacon's estimate of women, as shown in his works and in his life. What she says of Shakspere is literally true of Bacon. Read his essays on 'Love' and on 'Marriage,' (which I cannot take space to quote) and judge for yourselves.

"It is difficult to believe that a woman and a mother could have written what I have quoted from Mrs. Pott; and none but a woman whose head had been turned by an insane theory could have done it—one who would have to become only a trifle more demented to boil her baby, if need were to save her Bacon."

The atrocity of this libel on a scholarly woman caps the climax of Shakespearean folly. I feel safe in saying that Mrs. Pott's acquaintance, not only with Shakespearean and Baconian literature, but with all contemporary and prior English authors, is not surpassed by that of any English scholar. She it was who in 1883 published "Bacon's "Promus of Formularies and Elegancies," paralleling them with passages from Shakespeare. Very few of them were repeated in Bacon's open works or by other contemporary or earlier writers, except Shakespeare, in whose plays most of the 1080 notes, made by Bacon between 1594 and 1596, are, with more or less distinctness paralleled. And in regard to her classification of the 130 female characters in the plays I believe it will be approved and accepted by most if not quite all, fair-minded students of Shakespeare.

I have received many letters from Mrs. Pott, and I now take the liberty to quote a passage from one dated October 13, 1900:

"Mr. Appleton Morgan is mistaken in thinking that we are rich. My dear husband has worked hard all his life, and now at seventy-three, and crippled with rheumatic arthritis, works still to keep us going and to leave a little for our five girls to live, as our catechism tells us, 'in the state of life it has pleased God to call us.'"

And this is the motherly woman whom the erudite professor of Cambridge University denounces as "one who would have to become only a trifle more demented to boil her baby to save her Bacon!"

Soon after the publication of the Shaksper autographs by me, Prof. Rolfe denounced them as false (I never saw his article, and have to quote from hearsay.) I traced the autographs with my own hand from engravings in Drake's "Shakspeare and His Times," a book published in 1817 and little known to scholars. A photographic copy of the Drake engravings now appears in "Shaksper not Shakespeare;" also photographic copies of the original autographs, now much defaced with age. The engraved fac similes of 1817 are faithfully correct; and to say that my tracings are inaccurate is a falsehood. If I have been misinformed as to Prof. Rolfe's criticism of my published autographs of Shaksper, I beg his pardon. But when he uses such language as this: "inconceivable except to a Baconian or a fool," how can we regard him otherwise than as a literary outlaw?

WM. HENRY BURR, A. M.

LIFE'S MYSTERIES.

Two Noted Writers in the Chicago American Differ Thereon.

Mr. Gregory claims "We do not want to know life's secrets," and philosophizes thus:

The news has preached us that Dr. Etard, the distinguished chemist, chief of the Physiological Laboratory at the Institute, has resolved animal matter into two elements, albuminoid and sugar, found in vegetables and in cinder form in the earth.

Man is, therefore, a natural product of the earth, formed of simple elements undergoing infinite modifications.

The trend of the dispatch is to the effect that at last the secret of life is discovered and that nothing remains but the comparatively trivial task of making a living being.

But the thought will at once occur to sensible people that there is a tremendous difference between resolving animal matter into its original elements and the endowing of nonliving matter with life.

Chemistry may be easily able to tell what elements the body of a man or dog is composed of, but the test of the business is to take the elements that have been reached by the analysis and make out of them the man or dog as nature does.

When the scientific gentlemen shall have succeeded in creating even a tadpole out of nonliving matter they will be in a position to talk to us, but until they back up their alleged discoveries by some such practical demonstration the world will continue to believe that they are simply talking shop.

As a mattes of fact, the much-advertised "discoveries" along the lines of the genesis of life are all moonshine.

The wisest chemist of to-day can only exclaim with one of Shakespeare's characters: In Nature's infinite book of secrecy a LITTLE I can read."

A little—no more.

The way in which we are "fearfully and wonderfully made" is as much of a puzzle to us to-day as it was to the first man who ever thought about it.

Chemistry has indeed made marvelous strides, but the secret of life, the way in and by which nonliving matter becomes endowed with life, is as much hidden as ever.

All the chemists in creation, working together in concert, could not, if their eternal salvation depended upon it, make one poor angleworm or mosquito.

If the scientific gentlemen could make an angleworm or tadpole they could make a Pericles or Webster, a Patti or Kubelik. But they cannot; and the humblest living thing laughs at them while they are talking about their great discoveries.

The secret will not unfold itself. When interrogated it is dumb, and the scientist is left alone with his guess.

It is a blessing that such is the case. It is a blessing that there are some things in this old world that man can't find out. It is a blessing that behind all that we know there is a great, big background of mystery, which sends its floodtides of poetry rolling over the humdrum and commonplace of our little existence.

If the gentlemen who pass the most of their time in the laboratories should succeed in actually making a man, or even a dog or a bird, there would be nothing left for us to do but to cut our throats.

Life would no longer be worth the living. The romance, the charm, the beauty of the world would have departed, and the rest would be nausea and weariness.

It is simply because there are some things that cannot be explained in the laboratory that life is a glory and a joy to so many of the human race.

Explain these things—explain everything, wipe out all the mystery, brush away all the uncertainty—and human life on this planet would be unendurable. There would be no music, no more dreams, no more art, no more faith, and the history of the human race would become the history of a flock of sheep or a herd of swine.

GARRETT P. SERVISS.

Mr. Serviss, a noted scientist, says "Let us have no mysteries" and writes thus to the point:

The cry of science is for light. As long as the light grows science advances. The lovers of mystery have always been the enemies, secret or avowed, of science.

It amazes me to hear any intelligent man say: "Brush aside all the mystery, explain everything, and life on this planet would not be endurable."

Forsooth, shall we go back, then, to the dark ages, when everything was mystery?

On what principle can you distinguish between mysteries and say: "Let that one be banished, but this one must be kept sacred?"

The love of mystery stood in Galileo's way when he sought to establish the truth of the Copernican system. It has been in every age the refuge of priestcraft and kingcraft.

"Let the mysteries alone! Keep out the light! Avaunt with your explanations!" was the cry of the old Egyptian priests and theologic mummers as they lurked in the darkness of their gigantic temples, preying like vampires of the night upon the fears and superstitions of their ignorant dupes.

Ignorance and mystery and suppression of the spirit of investigation and explanation have been the foundation stones of every great edifice of despotism, whether political or religious, that the world has known.

Upon them rests to-day the autocracy of the Russian Czar and the anachronistic British monarchy, melting and trembling like a palace of ice on which the sun has risen—the sun of science and universal education.

Why is the mystery of life more sacred and less fit to be banished—if banished it can be—than the mystery of the universe? What right has any man to set limits to human knowledge? Is not this a return of the spirit that denounced Darwin? Does anyone dare to plant the three-legged stool of mystery for a throne upon the shore of the inrolling sea of knowledge, and sitting thereon, clothed with the cobwebs of superstition, shake the worm-eaten scepter of metaphysics at the breakers, sparkling in the sunshine, and command them to keep back?

It is not true that there are no poetry and romance except where mystery broods. On the contrary, the advance of science, continually widening the horizon of the mind, brings infinite riches for the jewel work of the imagination. Has there been less poetry in the stars since the telescope and the spectroscope began to reveal their secrets and to make manifest the true grandeur of the universe?

Observe the charm that Tennyson borrowed from his scientific reading. It inspires even his mediaeval idylls with deeper beauty.

"The old order changeth, yielding place to new."

The whole body of modern literature has been lifted to a higher plane and enriched with new ideas by the progress of science. There is no direction in which knowledge can expand without brightening life.

It is neither fair, nor just, nor wise, to sneer at the investigators in the laboratories, the men who bear the heat and sweat of the day, because, breathless, in the enthusiasm of a fresh discovery, they pause a moment to wipe their brows and gather fresh courage from a glance at the beaming countenance of Hope, who leads them on.

In those moments they see a little beyond the curtain, and we are not to blame them if they cannot instantly attain the object of their search. They will reach it eventually, be sure of that! They have silenced in the past too many croakers of the sacredness of mystery to permit any doubt of their ability to advance.

Shall we take our children by the hand, and, leading them through the beautiful halls of learning, suddenly stop at a closed door and tell them, with bated breath:

"Into this chamber seek never to penetrate. Here dwelleth Ignorance in the holiness of inviolable mystery."

Shall we do that, or shall we put the spirit of Bluebeard behind us and say: "Open every door whose handle will turn at your touch. There is neither hope nor danger of ever reaching the end, but in striving toward it you will infinitely increase the joy of living?"

Man wants to know all the mysteries that rise up before him; but as soon as he knows them they cease to be mysteries; they are known facts.

True, chemistry will tell us all the component parts of the human system, but fails to put the breath of life into a single being and make it live and move, and think, and talk, but the sciences that have uncovered the mystery thus far, have made it possible to whittle surgery down to a very accurate system, making it possible to remove an appendix, a leg, an arm, and even a stomach, without making the operation fatal to the afflicted person, therefore to know these secrets has saved many lives to their loved ones for a little while, at least.

It may never be in the province of science to secure a spirit with a desire to be clothed by them through chemical process. It is evident this is what they lack. Artificial incubation might be an easy thing if they could secure the germ for a starter.

The fact is, no matter how much science discovers, there always remains something undiscovered and seemingly unfathomable in life's great formative vortex, but it is the duty of science to unlock all the doors possible, and Spiritualism will materially aid them in their research whether they acknowledge or even secretly realize the truth of the spirit hand or the wave of thought handed down from the spirit sphere or not. BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. "THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. THE SESTINA.

With an Exemplification of One.

The following poem is a specimen of a peculiar form of poetry that is highly valued by connoisseurs, and one of the most difficult and complicated forms of thought-song. It was first "invented" by a minstrel of the thirteenth century named Arnould Daniel, and was afterwards copied by Spanish, French, Italian and Portuguese poets. It is called the "Sestina."

Its greastest peculiarity is in using the same final words in the lines of the several stanzas—not rhyming, but arranged in a certain regular order. The poem contains six six-lined stanzas, and a seventh having but three lines containing all six of the final words, three at the end and three in the body of the lines. The six words to be used as final words throughout the poem are the final words of the first stanza.

In the second stanza the final word of the first line ends with the last word of the first stanza, the second line ends with the last word of the first line, the third line ends with the last word of the fifth line, the fourth line ends with the last word of the second line, the fifth line ends with the last word of the fourth line and the sixth line ends with the last word of the third line. Thus throughout the poem the first line of each stanza or verse, ends with the last word of the previous stanza, the lines running in this order, from sixth to first, from fifth to second and from fourth to third. The final words of the last stanza are the last words of the fourth, sixth and fifth lines of the sixth stanza.

One writer says with reard to the Sestina: "One would imagine the task of maintaining rhyme-close to be sufficiently trammeling to thought without the added bit and curb of verbal arrangement. It would seem as if the rigidity of plan would strangle sense at birth, and that thought and reason would become hopelessly mingled and mangled in the word tangle. It does not seem possible that sentiment could float on top of such a whirl of proportional verbiage. Yet some very fine specimens of this form of poetry exists to-day. One of the celebrated English poets, E. W. Gosse, wrote a sestina, and Swinburne also wrote one. In 1882 Ella Wheeler Wilcox used the sestina in writing an allegory on the value of matured effort in art work.

TWILIGHT VISIONS.

I sit alone in the fading light,
Of a day that is almost gone,
I silently think of a sweet face,
That long ago passed from my sight,
But ofttimes as night comes creeping on,
I see in her accustomed place.

Yes, I oft think in the dear old place,
I see once more in the fading light,
The fairest face the sun e'er shone on;
I muse and dream till the day is gone,
Thinking 'tis fancy that brings to sight,
The sweet vision of my darling's face.

Can it be fancy that makes her face,
Shine with a glory that fills the place,
And lifts my soul with the holy sight,
To heights of heaven's eternal light?
Alas that it should so soon be gone,
And leave me in gloom to wander on.

The vision that comes as night draws on
That brings before me my darling's face,
Makes all the days that have come and gone
Seem much brighter, and her vacant place
At the fireside, is filled with a light,
That often thrills my enraptured sight.

Oh, these visions that fall on our sight,
They cheer our hearts as life's night comes on,
They bring to our weary souls, the light
Of perfect peace, and fill each sad face,
With a radiance from that bright place,
Where grief comes not and all pain is gone.

When the hopes of life seem crushed and gone,
And tears of anguish dim our sight,
If we will but seek some quiet place,
Where we can muse as night comes on,
We'll feel as though standing face to face,
With those who would lead us to light.

With our loved ones gone we'll journey on,
Not hidden from sight in fading light,
But in some bright place and face to face.

Woman Suffrage.

We suspicion that it is true enough that a woman would obstruct the polls by refusing to vote until she was sure that her hat was on straight, but we also suspicion that she would more than make up for this by seeing that her conscience was on straight too, which is a point that is absent-mindedly neglected by many an image of his Maker that wears pants.

Some persons that mistake a bad liver for cynicism often hint around that women would be sure to vote for the handsome candidates only. In looking over the portraits of the respected fellow-citizens that run all over the United States this year for offices of all kinds from constable to congress, it struck us that if women waited to cast their ballots for handsome men they wouldn't be likely to roll up a real heavy vote anywhere in this country.

We never could prevail on ourselves to take much stock in the theory that women like handsome men. They certainly don't seem to marry them.

It is true that women would be handicapped in politics because they can't well hang over a bar; and we note that few men can get a real close knowledge of the issue of the day until after the third drink. Women might have to use intuition instead of the more reliable and better known brands of rum to find out just how she ought to vote. Intuition is a female talent that is despised by man, but it is a good deal less noisy than his talents and does not produce as bad a taste in the mouth next morning.

When woman has the suffrage it is not likely that she will make election bets never to wash or to comb her hair, or to wheel another woman through town in a barrow if her candidate isn't elected. She also will probably be content to consider that election is over when the votes are counted. Perhaps she will feel badly for awhile and say that the other side is a mean thing, but after that she will see that the children are dressed and sent to school as usual and she won't spend the rest of the week in a ginmill explaining how it happened, and tapering off.

If a woman should bet a bat on the election and lose she would probably pay her bet. We admit that this would be an outrageous innovation and a blow at the bulwarks of the Republic. It is the only danger we can see in woman suffrage.—New York Press.

MISSIONARY.

Report of Mr. and Mrs. E. W Sprague.

Two months have passed since we made our last report to the Spiritualists through the press.

During the 61 days of March and April we held 64 meetings, visited 18 towns, organized and chartered seven new societies and visited seven of the old chartered associations. Three of these having met with adverse conditions neglected their per capita dues, but new interest was created, they paid their arrearages and were reinstated.

Our meetings were held in court houses, town halls, opera houses and other halls, two of them were held in parlors, two in a schoolhouse, and sixteen in churches of the following denominations: United Brethren, Friends, Close Communion Baptist, and four temples owned by the Spiritualists. We enjoyed holding meetings in our own temples, and will be glad when every society owns one.

Our lectures and messages were received with evident appreciation by all classes. A goodly number of our listeners hearing the sweet message of Spiritualism for the first time.

It is a great satisfaction to us to know that our National organization is growing in favor with the people as they learn more of the great work it is doing for our cause.

No one objects to organization any more; all are anxious for assistance from either State or National Association.

It is to be regretted that the N. S. A. has not yet grown to such proportions financially that it can furnish all the assistance asked for.

Though it cannot do this at present, it certainly is doing a great deal to carry the work along, while it gives great promise of becoming able to widen its field of usefulness in the future until its power will be felt in every community in the land.

The work in the missionary field has demonstrated that the Spiritualists are ready to co-operate in the good work as soon as some one is sent to assist them to organize.

If we could reach the millions of Spiritualists and make plain to them what may be gained by thorough organization and co-operative work, our cause would take the lead in the world's reforms.

The few missionaries the N. S. A. is able to send out now can reach but a small proportion of the many Spiritualists of the country. Most of those they do reach, as may be plainly seen, are ready to join the organization and put in practice their belief in co-operative work.

We are often told that there are millions of Spiritualists in the United States; if so, what kind of Spiritualists must many of them be? Judging from the support some of them are giving to the cause, they must be very poor, or very stingy.

If there are one hundred thousand Spiritualists in this country that could be induced to pay into the N. S. A. treasury annually fifty cents each, the board would have fifty thousand dollars each year with which they could build homes for our indigent and helpless mediums, homes for the aged, sick, and poor Spiritualists, homes for the orphan children of Spiritualists where they could be reared under the beautiful teachings of our philosophy. With this small amount from each one of the number named, colleges could be built, libraries established, chairs endowed for the investigation and promulgation of the great truths that Spiritualism has brought, and is still to bring to the world.

The greatest desire of every true Spiritualist to make Spiritualism what it should be in the eyes of the world could be realized, and all for the paltry sum of half a dollar each year from one hundred thousand Spiritualists. Why is not this assistance forthcoming? I will answer: Because we are not thoroughly organized. There is no other valid reason.

When we can reach the Spiritualists through thorough organization, all this and much more will be accomplished. Fellow Spiritualists, let us bestir ourselves, showing our self-respect and love for our cause.

The recent decision in the McIlroy will case ought to be a sufficient incentive to all Spiritualists to band themselves together for self-protection. This decision virtually dumps all of the Spiritualists of the world into one heap and labels them lunatics.

All of the people, including the judges and the juries, who are ignorant of the subject of Spiritualism, should be enlightened. We can do a mighty work in all departments of reform, and help to make the world a better place in which we live; at the same time giving to the people a knowledge of the life to come. Let us be up and doing for our earthly days will soon be done.

WONDERFUL.

Isn't it wonderful, when you think,
How the creeping grasses grow,
High on the mountain's rocky brink,
In the valleys down below?
A common thing is a grass blade small,
Crushed by the feet that pass—
But all the dwarfs and giants tall,
Working till doomsday shadows fall,
Can't make a blade of grass.

Isn't it wonderful, when you think,
How a little seed asleep,
Out of the earth new life will drink,
And carefully upward creep?—
A seed, we say, is a simple thing,
The germ of a flower or weed—
But all earth's workmen, laboring,
With all the help that wealth could bring,
Never could make a seed.

Isn't it wonderful, when you think,
How the wild bird sings his song,
Weaving melodies, link by link,
The whole sweet summer long?
Commonplace is a bird, always,
Everywhere seen and heard—
But all the engines of earth, I say,
Working on till the Judgment Day,
Never could make a bird.

Isn't it wonderful, when you think,
How a little baby grows,
From his big, round eyes, that wink and blink,
Down to his tiny toes?
Common thing is a baby though,
All play the baby's part—
But all the whirling wheels that go,
Flying round while the ages flow,
Can't make a baby's heart.

Home, Sweet Home.

Once more I find myself in the Northlands, greeted by smiles and handshakes from loving friends, and my heart echoes the song of "Home, Sweet Home."

Since leaving Chicago, a year ago, I have indeed been busy, every Sunday on the platform and as much as each evening of the week at times.

On my tour through Texas, as elsewhere, I found the people most hospitable. No time since I have been in the work can I say I have found more people ready to investigate and understand our beautiful philosophy.

I feel like saying to my sister and brother workers, let us be up and doing, leaving none to cry in vain for the consolation we as instruments in the hands of the higher forces can give.

I recall the words of one who wrote the following:

"There are hermit souls that live withdrawn,
In the peace of their self-content;
There are souls like stars, that dwell apart,
In a fellow firmament,
There are pioneer souls, that blaze their paths,
Where highways never ran,
But let me live by the side of the road,
And be a friend to man.

"Let me live in a house by the side of the road,
Where the race of man go by;
The men who are good, the men who are bad,
As good and as bad as I.
I would not sit in the scorners' seat
Nor hurl the cynic's ban.
Let me live in the house by the side of the road,
And be a friend to man.

"I see from my house by the side of the road,
By the side of the highway of life,
The men who pass with the ardor of hope—
The men who are faint with strife—
But I turn not away from their smiles, from their tears,
Both parts of an infinite plan.
Let me live in my house by the side of the road,
And be a friend to man."

All mankind needs our teachings,
Let us never turn away from one soul who seeks that which we possess.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Mr. Edw. Swift, one of New Philadelphia's best citizens passed over to the spirit side of life, June 13, 1902. He lived on the earth plane about 50 years. About two years ago he lost a dear relative, which led him to investigate Spiritualism, and he became thoroughly convinced of the reality of the future life, and salvation for all without any "vicarious atonement." The writer's family esteemed him as a very dear friend, whose early transition is deeply regretted by a large circle of friends.

C. H. MATHEWS.
New Philadelphia, Ohio.

Passed to spirit life from her late residence, 917 N. 19th street, St. Louis, Mo., Mrs. Mary T. Harrington, widow of Francis A. Harrington, aged 82 years and 7 months. WILLIAM GESKE.

Mrs. G. V. Austin passed to the higher life, June 14. Spiritualism was to her and all her family a great comfort in the hour of separation. No, not dead, but only gone before. Funeral services were conducted by Mr. Post, of Allegan, Mich., (a Spiritualists), and burial there. MRS. HELEN F. THOMAS.

WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Read His Valuable Book "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You His Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A.M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored had traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing, and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

The Mecca says: "Psychic Poems."

That erudite critic, Wm. Emmette Coleman: "To all lovers of good poetry this book is confidently recommended."

Will Carlton: "I have read with great interest."

Sarah Thorpe Thomas, the Humanitarian says: "A most exquisite bouquet * * * * the thoughts echo and re-echo through the deepest recesses of my heart. I have some word of praise for every page."

THE KING'S OATH.

It Is Exceedingly Amusing as a Literary Production.

A writer in the Christian Observer, of Louisville, Ky., makes the following comment upon King Edward's declaration:

"When King Edward VII. recently ascended the throne of England, according to law he took the 'Declaration' which is required of the new king, either at a meeting of parliament previous to his coronation, or in addition to the coronation oath. It is in the following words:

"'I, A. B., by the grace of God, King (or Queen) of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, do solemnly and sincerely, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, that I do believe that in the sacrament of the Lord's Supper there is not any transubstantiation of the elements of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ at or after the consecration thereof by any person whatsoever; and that the invocation or adoration of the Virgin Mary or any other saint, and the sacrifice of the mass, as they are now used in the Church of Rome, are superstitious and idolatrous. And I do solemnly, in the presence of God, profess, testify and declare, that I do make this declaration, and every part thereof, in the plain and ordinary sense of the words read unto me, as they are commonly understood by English Protestants, without any evasion, equivocation, or mental reservation whatsoever, and without any dispensation already granted me for this purpose by the Pope, or any other authority or person whatsoever, or without any hope of any such dispensation from any person or authority whatsoever, or without thinking that I am or can be acquitted before God or man, or absolved of this declaration or any part thereof, although the Pope, or any other person or persons, or power whatsoever, should dispense with or annul the same, or declare that it was null and void from the beginning.'

"To this there has been great objection, from the Romanists in England, on the ground that it contains an insult to their religion; and quite a debate has been held in the House of Lords on the subject of changing its language.

"This history of this declaration is brief and suggestive. In years prior to the seventeenth century the Pope of Rome had claimed and exercised the right of civil government in England. He had issued bulls deposing or excommunicating kings of England, had absolved the people of Great Britain from obedience to their king, and had freely interfered in the civil government of the realm. Not content with this, the Pope had demanded and secured the enactment of civil laws for the persecution of the Protestants.

"From this tyranny the people of England released themselves, (1) in the days of Henry VIII. and Edward VI.; only to find themselves re-enslaved under 'Bloody Mary'; (2) in the days of Elizabeth, only to come under the menace of Rome again under Charles I.; (3) in the days of Cromwell, only to be again subjected through the acts of Charles II. and James II. to the same civil oppression. When, therefore, in 1689, the people of England once more threw off the papal yoke, they adopted a bill of rights, to make sure that no one who would connive at such civil interference should ever again be crowned in England. Its ninth clause reads:

"'That all and every person and persons that is, are, or shall be reconciled to, or shall hold communion with, the see or church of Rome, or shall profess the popish religion, or shall marry a papist, shall be excluded, and be forever incapable to inherit, possess, or enjoy the crown and government of this realm and Ireland, and the dominions thereunto belonging, or any part of the same, or to have, use, or exercise any regal power, authority, or jurisdiction within the same; and in all and every such case or cases the people of these realms shall be, and are hereby absolved of their allegiance; and the said crown and government shall from time to time descend and be enjoyed by such person or persons, being Protestants, as should have inherited and enjoyed the same, in case the said person or persons so reconciled, holding communion, or professing, or marrying, as aforesaid, were naturally dead.'

"It was at such a time that the 'Declaration' was adopted and appointed as condition of ascending the throne. It was applied not only to the king, but (by the test act of 1673) to every officeholder, civil and military, in the kingdom. The nation had had enough of Romish interference in their governmental affairs, and resolved to be free from it forever.

"An article in the 'Nineteenth Century and After,' written from a Roman Catholic standpoint, assails this 'Declaration' as if it were a matter of religion, an insult to the Catholic faith. To us it appears rather as a barrier against interference in their civil affairs.

"Let it be remembered that even to the present day the oath of a Roman Catholic bishop declares that his first and primal obedience is due to the Pope; and that every individual Catholic is taught and is held to be subject implicitly to the bishop and the priest. In this fact there was good justification—under the circumstances then existing, the recent efforts of Rome to dominate England—for some law which should keep out of office those who would use the office to upset the government of England. They framed this law in terms of transubstantiation and the invocation of Mary—unfortunate in its terms, effective in its purpose.

"Time has passed. The Pope, while adhering theoretically to his claim of power to make or unmake kings, has, of late years, refrained from its exercise. In 1803, Mr. Plunkett proposed in the English parliament to relieve all Catholics from taking this 'Declaration,' thereby enabling them to hold office in England. It was not, however, till the year 1829, under the leadership of Sir Robert Peel, that both the 'Declaration' and the similar oath of the 'Test Act' were repealed, so far as they applied to members of parliament, and most of the civil and military officers of the realm. It was, however, still required from the lord chancellors of England and Ireland, and the chancellors of the universities. The act of 1837 released the obligation upon these officers and left it binding upon the king alone.

"Since the accession of Edward VII., the matter has again been before the House of Lords, and a committee brought in a modified form of the 'Declaration' from which much violence of language has been expunged, and it has been adopted by that House. In its modified form it now reads:

"'I, A. B., by the Grace of God King (or Queen) of Great Britain and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, do solemnly and sincerely in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, that I do believe that in the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper there is not any transubstantiation of the elements of bread and wine into the body and blood of Christ, at or after the consecration thereof by any person whatsoever. And I do believe that the invocation or adoration of the Virgin Mary or any other saint, and the sacrifice of the mass as they are now used in the Church of Rome, are contrary to the Protestant religion. And I do solemnly, in the presence of God, profess, testify, and declare, that I do make this Declaration and every part thereof unreservedly.'

"Firmly and strongly do we adhere to the principle of the entire severance of church and state. And glad will we be when the English government shall take a similar position. It ought to be done at once. It ought to emanate from those who are not Catholics. Yet on the other hand, when Catholics come to plead for the abolition of the 'Declaration,' they ought to bring with them first of all a renunciation of the claim of the Pope to any interference in civil affairs. Until such a time they have no ground of complaint."

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

Brief Notes on Various Subjects.

A whole week has been absorbed by the Mystic Shriners, in the various efforts of our people to entertain them properly. We also hope they enjoyed the programme of entertainment as much as did the residents of San Francisco the making ready for their guests. We had the pleasure of a call from Comrade C. L. Elchin, of Chicago, a member of Medinah Temple, who took this opportunity to visit the Pacific coast. He fell quite in love with the climate and situation. The largest part of our Eastern visitors are now en route for their homes, carrying with them the best wishes of all their acquaintances, new and old, on this slope.

In the line of electric light decoration our manipulators have exceeded all previous efforts; by putting the lights together they seem to have drawn continuous lines of fire wherever a wire was extended. The whole dome of the city hall was a notable example. Standing on one of the overlooking hills, this fiery cupola was a perfect picture of a bishop's head-gear, when arrayed in the robes of pontifical office. Was it an omen of the dominance of church over state, in a country teeming with Spanish memories and legacies?

Looking out on the bay a few days ago, we noticed particularly some of Uncle Sam's warships and transports, there flashed the thought, that both the United States and England, are still under the spell of war. Man pays a fearfully costly price for the blood shed in war. As the two principal nations of the earth are beginning to recover from the Delirium Terrible of conquest, may we not ask if it is not about time for us to cultivate the arts of peace once more? It is not through the fiery mesh of consuming war, we are to attain, but by the study and exercise of the beneficent, creative acts of peace.

We are rapidly approaching the midsummer dullness. Our schools are closing, and teachers and pupils are seeking rest amidst the greenery of nature, to gain strength for the next season.

At the last regular meeting of directors of the State Spiritualist Association, arrangements were made to take care of the Association when it meets here in September next. We trust that with the late decision of the courts, favoring the true status of Spiritualism as a religion, we shall have a notable and an enthusiastic assembly.

George E. White, well known as the "Cattle King," has passed on. He was taken suddenly ill while on horseback, and was forced to dismount and in his distress to lie upon the ground. Here he was found by an acquaintance who took him to his home, where he was cared for until the summons from earth life came. He has been a believer in the doctrines of Spiritualism.

Oakland, this state, has undertaken to tax mediumship, after the court decisions which have already been rendered in our favor. Like the city fathers of many another city, they evidently have not heard of things they do not desire to hear. One of these is that an ordinance of that kind is void because unconstitutional.

These people resemble the Washington postoffice authorities, who when confronted with the fact that they cannot legislate, break out in some new spot just as bad, under change of name. In our country it is not often that bureaucratic policy is allowed to have such autocratic swing, but there has been a full dose, during the last six months.

One can hardly take up a liberal newspaper or magazine now-a-days, and fail to note some allusion to organization. The fact is, that on all lines of close communion thought, years of companionship and action on practical lines have brought the members into a movement resembling military drill. Not only do they act in unity, but let a persecuted person of their number appeal for help, and "he is one of our people" becomes a magic formula, which rallies the whole body as one, to support, strengthen and sustain against ill-fortune of any kind.

Is it not time, that those who believe in the same fundamental truth shall feel some sort sustaining unity and trust in the fealty of one for another, within the bounds of the seekers for the truth that shall set us free? Even if we could feel helpful one toward another, laying aside all weaknesses and jealousies that are born of selfishness, and desire for egotistical distinction, it would go a long way toward helping to resist successfully outside encroachment. Will the time never come when we can cheerfully subordinate the personal to the general good?

W. P. PHELON, M. D.
San Francisco, Cal.

"HOLY WARS" ARE COMPLETELY PLAYED OUT.

To the Editor:—The Chicago Tribune has some excellent thoughts in connection with "Holy Wars," which we incorporate herewith. It is true that war remains, but the "holy war" has almost gone. There will be just and unjust wars, wars for trivial or for weighty causes, wars to acquire territory or to gain trade, but there will not be "holy wars." They have fled with the romance and splendor of battle, with the spears and the shields, the helmet and the panoplied courser, and the "white plume" that was "the oriflamme of war." No more will men go forth to battle shouting "for God, for the cause, for the church, for the laws."

History records many a "holy war" where religious fervor or fanaticism nerved the arms of one or of both participants and hurled them, reckless of death, against their foes. The Jews fought "holy wars" under Joshua and under the Maccabees, and Jehovah was with them. They fought with equal bravery when Titus besieged Jerusalem, but Jehovah was not with them. The wars of Mohammed and succeeding Caliphs were "holy wars" in name and in deed, and holiness was always supposed to perch high on the standard of the victor. The banner of the prophet was carried from Medina to the Pyrenees. The crusades were "holy wars." The Europeans fought in the name and for the greater glory of God. When they won they thanked him. The Saracens relied with equal confidence on the protection of Allah. When they died they felt assured of the promised paradise of Mohammed. When they overcame the "Christian dogs" they thanked their god.

To-day the "holy war" is confined to races the civilized world looks on as heathenish and uncivilized. It is more and more difficult for one Christian nation warring with another to assume that it is conducting a "holy war" and to appeal confidently for victory on account of the "justice of its cause" to the same God its opponents are appealing to for victory on account of the justice of their cause. Under these circumstance it is better for neither side to lay claim to superior holiness, but, like the Yankee parson in the revolution, to ask God, if unwilling to aid the Americans, to "stand neutral and let flesh and blood decide the issue." "Keep your powder dry" is still the prudent maxim. Should there be to-morrow a "holy war" anywhere in the East, between Mindanao and the Bosporus, how much would the belief of the heathen engaged in it that they were fighting in a holy cause count for? How much holiness must one have when fighting with primitive weapons an opponent who has the best of modern weapons in order to come out ahead? To what extent does a belief in a free pass to heaven help the warrior now? It did help him once. It would insure him victory now if fighting an antagonist less fanatical and no better armed than himself. The mad onset of the dervishes in the Soudan would have broken the battle line of British troops armed only with matchlocks and with spears. It fares ill with the best armed and disciplined troops if it come to a hand-to-hand encounter with dervishes, Zulus, or an infuriated city mob.

But the day of fighting at close quarters is at an end. Richard, with his battleax and Saladin with his scimetar no longer meet in battle. The mailclad warrior no longer rides down his adversary. War has ceased to be picturesque, romantic, and individual. It has ceased to be spiritual. There may have been something spiritual in it when carried on by men who met face to face and saw the whites of one another's eyes before they shot. There is no spiritual side to the magazine gun, which sweeps away the men in the charging line when they are half a mile from the works they wish to capture. The magazine gun has no emotions, no sensibilities, no perception of "holiness" or of an "inner life." It is a searching, far-reaching instrument of the "inner death." Achilles, Hector, and their peers were mighty warriors in their day. They did great deeds on "the ringing plains of windy Troy," but their hosts, if confederated, would have been routed by one Maxim gun.

Frontal attacks are impossible to civilized troops. They will not be attempted again. They are equally impossible for uncivilized troops, no matter if they see the houris beckoning to them through the dust of the battle. The mad, furious rush of the "holy" warrior, on the success of which victory depended, is stopped now by a deadly hail of bullets. The true believer may reach paradise, but he does not reach the enemy's breastworks. He falls outside.

The "holy war" is no more a serious proposition than is the "yellow terror." It has gone to "the isle of the long ago," to be stored with the other relics which are heaped up there. It is there one must look for the pomp and pageantry of war, the waving banners and the floating plumes, the exhortations of the commanders as they ride down the lines. The tumult, the shouting, and the sounding of the trumpets of barbaric warfare are drowned in the deadly rattle of modern musketry. It strikes a diapason that speedily silences all other sounds and many of the men who make them.

The "holy war" is an anachronism. It has survived the ordeal by battle when God was supposed to decide between the false man and the true by allowing the latter to win the fight. It is time that the "holy war," too, should be consigned to the limbo of forgotten things. "Holiness" may have been a camp-follower of armies once, but it is not now. It has no place in war.

But from whom did these holy wars originate? Only God's children—so supposed—participated in them. No free thinker ever thought of starting a war to suppress or overcome some one else. The real curse of the world has arisen from those who claimed to be the mouthpiece of God. Every holy war has arisen from them. The real savior of the world has been the

FREE THINKER.

DELUSION.

The fisher lad stooped from his skiff-side,
To dip his net in the sea,
When up from the deep, deep waters
A face looked smilingly.
A face in a frame of sunlight,
With a smile like the rippling wave,
With lips that would tempt and trouble
And eyes that would calm and save.

He gazed too long for his future,
Too long for his peace of mind,
He poured his soul in his worship,
Devoted, ceaseless, blind.
He swept his net through the water,
But the vision passed away,
The wave grew calm, but it came not,
Though he watched through many a day.

He never knew 'twas a maiden
That leaned from the rock above
Whose face had looked from the sea-depths
With eyes like a dream of love.
He never knew, though he passed her
Each day, as to and fro,
Weary and sick with longing,
To his task he'd sadly go.

So we gaze in the future's waters,
For the visions they portray,
So we long for the unreturning,
Nor heed the blest to-day.
So we cast our nets for the shadows,
Fleet phantoms of the tide,
Nor dream in our blind delusion
That the real is at our side.

—Hattie Horner Louthan.

Red Jacket.

The circumstances of his decease were striking. For some months previous to his death time had made such ravages on his constitution as to render him fully sensible of his approaching dissolution. To that event he often adverted and always in the language of philosophic calmness. He visited successively all his most intimate friends at their cabins, and conversed with them upon the condition of their nation in the most impressive and affecting manner. "I am about to leave you," he said, "and when I am gone, and my warnings shall be no longer heard or regarded, the craft and avarice of the white man will prevail. Many whites have I breasted the storm, but I am an aged tree and can stand no longer; my leaves are fallen, my branches are withered, and I am shaken by every breeze. Soon my aged trunk will be prostrate, and the foot of the exulting foe of the Indian may be placed upon it in safety, for I have none who will be able to avenge such an indignity. Think not I mourn for myself. I go to join the spirits of my fathers, where age cannot come, but my heart fails when I think of my people, who are soon to be scattered and forgotten. Bury me by the side of my former wife, and let my funeral be according to the customs of our nation. Let me be dressed and equiped as my fathers were, that their spirits may rejoice at my coming. Be sure that my grave be not made by a white man; let them not pursue me there."

M. V. S. A. Camp.

The twentieth annual meeting at Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton, Iowa, opens July 27, continuing up to and including August 24. The very best of talent has been secured for the platform and we are assured that mediums of all phases will be present. Among our speakers we number H. D. Barrett, president N. S. A.; Miss Lizzie Harlow, Jennie Hagan Brown, Prof. W. F. Peck, president M. V. S. A.; Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates, Georgia G. Cooley, and we have three most excellent test mediums for the season, J. Homer Altemus who comes to our camp for the first time and who bears an enviable reputation in his home city which is Washington, D. C.; Mrs. Zalda Brown Kates is so well known in her test work that we have only to say that she will follow both her own and Mr. Kates' lectures with tests; Mrs. Cooley is quite at home at our camp where her work has been most excellent in the past; she will give several seances the first two weeks. On Iowa State day Mrs. Eva McCoy will be with us and give such messages as are given to her. She is also new to our camp. Her work is of a high grade and bears the stamp of genuineness.

The Western Passenger Association has granted a rate of a fare and a third for the round trip on the certificate plan. Tickets to be bought on July 24, 25 and 26 and thereafter on Tuesdays and Fridays during the continuance of the meeting, good to return for three days after the close. A certificate should be taken with each ticket purchased. And where the person comes over more than one road the ticket should be bought to the junction point and from there another one should be purchased taking a certificate with each. These rates are practically the same as those granted last year.

The Diamond Jo line of steamers grants a rate of one transportation fare for the round trip from all points between St. Paul and St. Louis.

The park at Clinton was never more beautiful than it is this season. The trees and grass are in fine condition, while the superintendent of grounds, Mr. L. M. Rose, is planting flowers and vines and taking a great deal of pains to make it a place pleasing to the most critical eye. Excellent accommodations are furnished on the grounds. Mr. and Mrs. B. M. Stowell are expected to furnish good table board for the low price of $3.50 per week. So come to camp-meeting; you can live as cheaply there as at home.

Makes All the Difference.

The prophet of the God of Israel said to the prophet of Baal: Call louder, perhaps your God sleeps or perchance he is off on a journey; and, as we remember, it is nowhere said the prophet of Israel was jugged for blasphemy. But you get up in meeting, when they are praying for rain that does not come, to say anything like that, and you'll be in the penitentiary before you can say God with your mouth open.

Oh, but, say you, the God of Israel was an immense improvement on Baal. No doubt of it. The idea of God has been improving ever since those early days when the woods were full of them and there was one at the head of each spring branch.

The Mohammedan claims that Allah, the God of Arabia, is a decided improvement on the God of Palestine, if for no other reason than that he begets no sons and hath no partners. An old and eminent divine gives us to understand that he often blushes for his idea of God when he began his ministry. The orthodox rural parson does not blush, for he does not know any better, and probably never will.

The claim that the God of Israel is ne plus ultra is based on the special inspiration of those who wrote the Jewish "Sacred Book." The sacred book, the Vedas, of India, claims to have been written by God himself, and Brahm could hardly have made any mistake about himself. But where is the proof in either case? St. Paul said: The Greek demands a reason; the Jew is content with a sign. The Greek demands that all books have the internal evidence. The large-sized revolt in the church itself suggests that the "sacred" books of Israel perhaps do not have the internal evidence necessary to produce conviction in all educated minds. The historical is being surrendered, the ethical retained. But how about the early treatment of women slaves, and the enemy in war? How even about turning the other cheek for a smite after the cheek of the first part has been served? Does any man do that? What would you think of the man who did do it? If it be said that we must incline to forgiveness rather than to revenge, then other sacred books have said that, and shown as much ethical inspiration in a general way.

It is the church which takes on itself to prescribe what you shall believe, and what not believe. And a large part of the prescription is from Paradise Lost, Watts' Hymns, John Wesley, and a few others. For on examination you are surprised to find what slim foundation there is in the Scriptures for much that comes from the pulpit. As the church has had exclusive manipulation of the Scriptures, it ought to have been able to do better for its contentions.

You may criticize Baal, and even laugh at him, as the prophet did; also Brahm and the rest, for they have no friends in this country. But be exceeding careful what you say about the God of Israel; for he is also the God of the orthodox church, and the church still has the upper hand. The stake has been pulled up; but the fall has not gone anywhere, and by their presence the internal evidence of the truth of the Bible is made good.

WHY ARE WE HERE?

A Sermonette by Rev. Mary C. Billings.

Why are we here, as human beings, on this lower plane of existence? We are here to grow. Growth is the first law of being.

Physical, intellectual and spiritual growth should mark each stage of our earthly lives. First, there is the body in its infancy, with its gradual growth and development; slowly, yet surely, none but a mother can so fully realize, while day by day she marks each step of its physical gain, as the weeks and the months go by. And what a wonderful and beautiful process is this, when we thoughtfully contemplate this first and earliest development of a human life.

This comes to us with striking force, as we look at the tiny babe in its mother's arms and contrast our mature bodies—their size, strength of muscle and nerve, and coarse fibre, with the wee, tender little creature, its soft, dimpled flesh, delicate fibre, and perfection of form!

We note its soft pink feet, unworn by contact with the rough earth, and say: "Is it possible, that forty or fifty years ago, we could have been such delicate little morsels of humanity?" That we were such sweet bits of helpless and lovely innocence? It is then that we understand (in part) the beautiful miracle of human, physical growth.

As we think of this we are not surprised that in all the ages; strong and even coarse-minded men have been softened and subdued by personal contact with these little ones, fresh from the heavenly side. Or that these little darlings often become their better angels, leading them out, and up, into a higher and clearer spiritual atmosphere.

All this of physical growth. But if the growth and development of our physical bodies were all there is to a human life, it would be no more interesting than that of the animal creation. For the body alone is only a tabernacle for the residence of other and more enduring qualities, of the intellect, which will grow and expand, more or less rapidly, according to the care bestowed, according as it is helpful and judicious, or otherwise.

Yet, let us not ignore the fact, that the physical growth and health of the body, is of great importance. Can the inmates of a dilapidated house—open to rain and wind, to burning sunshine and wintry cold, be comfortable, healthy or happy? Can any one living in a dark, damp house, filled with noxious vapors, be in a good condition intellectually any more than physically?

Thus the mind, confined in a gross, sensual and uncleanly body, cannot be in a normal condition of growth; or come into its proper development, or up to its highest achievement. Therefore, we know, it is of the greatest importance, to properly care for and cultivate our human bodies, as upon them depend the health and progress of not only our intellectual capacities, but also of our spiritual natures.

We were born into this world to grow, not only physically and intellectually, but spiritually, as well. For we are spiritual entities, each and all of us. This is the real ego. The answer that a recent advanced writer gave to the interviewer, who asked him if he had a soul? expresses a central truth in a few words. "No," replied the writer, who was interrogated, "I have no soul. I am a soul. I have a body."

Moral and spiritual growth is the highest form of human development of, or it is growth and development of the soul, and that is the most important of all things.

One may become vastly learned on intellectual lines unless the moral and spiritual faculties are grown and developed into harmonious activity, unkindness, injustice and vice may disfigure the life.

There have been many highly intellectual people whose lives were dwarfed or distorted by selfishness and crime; their spiritual perceptions grossly clouded and their higher natures overlaid with the grime and dust of earth. This is pitiful. Observation seems to show that there are some persons naturally less moral, less spiritually-minded than others. We may find the cause in the parent stock, or in more remote ancestral heredity. That such ones have more difficulty in reaching high moral and spiritual planes, than those who are born under favorable conditions is evident. And such ones deserve the more credit in thus overmastering natural environment and tendency.

Spiritual growth is of paramount importance in our individual lives. We cannot afford to allow this highest part of our personality—the divine ego—to become dormant or to be covered with layers of material dust until (though as human beings, we may be highly intellectual) we shall be poor and weak, in that which constitutes our divinest riches and our grandest strength.

We were born into this lower life to grow into higher spiritual conditions, to become fitted for a life of spiritual unfoldment on the other side, toward which all our lives are tending. Let us live in an atmosphere of spiritual purity here, so that our lives over on the diviner side of existence, may not be hindered by the necessity of overcoming much of evil, that we have allowed to cling to us on earth; but that they may be as the winged bird, that they may ever expand and soar in the boundless air of celestial light.

OBSERVATIONS

In Reference to Spiritualism in Kansas.

Some time previous to the annual convention of the Kansas State Spiritualist Association, Mr. W. Wagner, one of the official board of that association, wrote to the president saying that if Laura B. Payne was put on the program when the state association met in the city, he and some others would not aid the association.

The president, D. W. Hull, who stands for truth and is always ready to condemn fraud, replied by asking Mr. Wagner if he meant that as a threat.

This letter was turned over to Mr. A. Markley for reply, he being president of the Occult Club. He answered the letter saying, that it was the Occult Club that objected instead of the State Association.

The objection to Mrs. Payne was solely for the reason that she took a decided stand against trickery in mediumship. It is plain to any unprejudiced mind that this action is not spirituality in any degree, and cannot be called Spiritualism.

At one session of the association, the president, Mr. Hull, stated that "tests" would be given. One medium arose and said she hated the words "tests;" said she did not believe in testing mediums any more; said they had been tested enough. Whatever mediums give should be accepted as truth.

Being a reader of your journal, I learned that some so-called mediums had been tested too much for their financial good, as their income decreased after each exposure.

The president intended no such meaning when he spoke of "tests." He meant that the spirit message given would be a test to the one receiving it. But some mediums never lose an opportunity to tell an audience how honest they are, and how wrong it is to doubt anything a medium says or does.

After reading the columns of your paper, which I believe has done more than all else to elevate the standard of Spiritualism by boldly giving its readers the truth, and from what I have observed, I am convinced that there are fraudulent mediums who manipulate their tricks solely for the revenue it brings them. I heard one medium state in the Occult Club that genuine mediums were few and far between; that there were only four genuine slate-writing mediums in the United States; and she also stated that she was one of the four.

Why anybody will stand out boldly and advocate fraud by claiming some converts may be made even by tricks, is beyond my knowledge; still we believe that the State Association in the future has hopes of success by electing A. S. Bledsoe its president. When nominated by the Occult Club, he arose and said that he wanted it understood that he was not the nominee of the Occult Club; that if he was elected president of the State Association, he wanted it to be by the State Association, and he would serve them unbiased, regardless of any club or clique, but might have to use several clubs before his term expired. From what I know of the man, he is broad and capable, with honest convictions and courage to carry them out.

It is often asked why Spiritualism bears a stigma. From my vantage ground as one searching unselfishly for facts, I can plainly see that it is not the true Spiritualist who is to blame; for some of them, yes, many, are the best and highest, intellectually and morally, but the great octopus of Modern Spiritualism is "fakeism," and whether trickery should be or not be sanctioned amongst Spiritualists, or elsewhere, on any ground, is not debatable; no one can uphold it or sanction it in any way and remain a good citizen, much less a good Spiritualist.

If every true Spiritualist would rise against it, as many have done, it would soon cease to prosper, and Spiritualism would become respectable everywhere. AN INVESTIGATOR.

Unseen Companionship.

The Rev. Daniel March, D. D., author of "Night Scenes in the Bible" and standard theological works, says:

"There are more living persons in the crowd than any human observer can count. There are more listeners in the public assembly than can be seen by the speaker's eye. There is no solitude of earth where we do not have the unseen companionship of beings that think and feel, and work more mightily and constantly than ourselves. As these invisible, unembodied partners of our toil, and sharers of our spiritual life, have sometimes stepped forth from behind the curtain that hides the unseen world, to show us that we may have witnesses to our conduct, when we think ourselves most alone, we have only to turn to the sacred records to learn that these high and mighty ones, whose home is in some far distant world, have borne an active part both in the common and in the great events of this world which we call ours. They have taken the form of men, and shown themselves to human eyes and spoken aloud in the languages of the earth."

When Christianity is no longer taught in any of our public schools, and every one is left free to choose for himself or herself what course to pursue, the beautiful ethics of Spiritualism, pure and undefiled, will then be taught in our universities by trained professors, who will instruct the sons and daughters of the 20th century in a rational religion (if such it may be called) and the close of the century will show an advance in progress and social prosperity such as the world has not seen since Adam and Eve were driven out of Eden and "God pronounced a curse upon the world," and the mothers of the human race. WHAT IS LOVE?

It Is the Creed of Spiritualism.

At no time within the history of this great republic has there been a greater need of a thorough and practical understanding of what is popularly called "the creed of Spiritualism" and its psychic influence upon its votaries, and a still greater need of disseminating its far-reaching truths among its antagonists. The very elements of a true government are found among its precepts, with the home life and the happiness so much desired by all, and the LOVE of our fellow men is only discerned through the spectroscope of the Spiritualist.

What is Love, and what do the common people comprehend by it, and what are the possibilities to be derived from it when more fully understood?

No better illustration could be given than by relating a vision I had about four years ago. While traveling in the State of California, I had been lecturing in the city of Oakland and had been closely questioned by a number of intelligent skeptics and non-believers upon the benefit of Spiritualism, and what good had been accomplished by it heretofore, as well as asserting condemnation of the creed that Spiritualists were free lovers. These questions and charges I answered at the time to the best of my ability; they were well directed and placed me upon my mettle. After the meeting closed and I had retired to my room I went into a perfect trance, my body was as a broken piece of machinery while my mind was active with the things taught by psychic influences. I was surrounded by a white light, a light which threw no shadow, and my spirit was taken from my body in a northwesterly direction to a large fertile prairie in the midst of which was an immense building; this building stood facing the south with an "L" on the west.

As I stood there a voice spoke from the white light saying: "This is the highest idea of the political economist of to-day, and the culmination of his efforts. This building is an immense department store owned and controlled by the government. This "L" contains the telegraph, telephone and postal systems, all alike controlled by the government." At this juncture a door opened and I saw a handsome young lady, with blue eyes and light hair, attending to the telephone and telegraph systems. As I entered she handed me a pad upon which to dictate my telegram. I took it in my hand and looking at it said: "What do you want me to do with this?"

She looked at me in astonishment and answered, "Why, to write your telegram upon."

I replied, "That is not the way I send my telegrams."

She pointed to the telephone box and said, "There is the telephone box; you can use that."

To this I replied, "I do not use your telephone."

She then pointed to the back part of the building, which was separated by a sort of a wicker work, and which was presided over by another young lady somewhat resembling herself, and said, "There is the postoffice."

But I said, "Neither do I use the postoffice to send messages."

Then she asked, "How do you send messages, pray?"

To this I replied, "I simply look and think and send my mind anywhere and at any time to any part of the universe and see what I want to see and know what I want to know."

"Why," she said, "you must be a kind of a Spiritualist; I have heard of you people but have never met any; I should like to read something about your work; I would like to learn your creed."

"Our creed," I said; "we have no creed."

"No creed?" she answered.

"No; if we have a creed it is very short," I replied.

"That is all the better," she said, "for I am a very busy woman; how short is it?"

I replied, "If we have a creed it consists of but one word."

"One word," she said, "why our creed is very long; what is the word?"

"That word is LOVE," was my answer.

"How absurd," she answered, "I could not love any one but John."

At this juncture the post-mistress, who had been leaning against the wicker-work, listening to the conversation, spoke up in astonishment, saying, "O yes, Mary, and Christ." Now Mary was not positive about Christ; but she was sure she loved John. During all this time I was still surrounded by the white light. I looked a short distance to the east and saw a beautiful residence, and discovered that John had spent the previous evening there with another young lady who was of the opposite complexion to this young woman. I then said, "Do you love the young lady with whom John spent the last evening, in yonder fine residence?" pointing to the mansion just mentioned.

"What," she said, "did John spend the evening there? I will kill him if he spends another evening there with that young lady. I told him so before."

I said to her, "My dear friend, I thought you told me you loved John?"

"So I do," she answered, "but I will kill him if he ever spends the evening there again; I am not going to have it."

I replied, "If you loved John as we understand love, you would not only love him, but the young lady also, with whom he spent the evening; you would not only love him but the whole human family; you would love all birds and beasts and all flowers and all nature, more than you do yourself. For love is the greatest power in the universe, and when you learn to love, when you learn to understand our creed and live it, you can then do away with the telephone system, your telegraph system and your postal system. Yes, you can do more, you can do away with your doctors, your lawyers, and policemen. You will have no millionaires and no poverty, no sickness or insanity, and we will have heaven upon earth. Your idea of Love is the exact opposite."

A Correction.

To the Editor:—In my article on Theosophy, replying to F. A. Bruce, as published in your issue of June 21, the following paragraph appears:

"God severely punishes his children in one incarnation for wrongful acts committed in previous physical bodies, but for reasons, the justice of which is not apparent, he takes away their 'theory' of those actions, thus they are liable to be reincarnated a thousand times to be punished a thousand times for the same offense."

Rectory Knockings.

Spiritualism as Manifested in the Wesley Homestead.

On the night of December 2, 1716, Robert Brown, Mr. Wesley's servant, and one of the maids of the family were alone in the dining-room. About ten o'clock they heard a strong knocking on the outside of the door which opened into the garden. They answered the call, but no one was there. A second knock was heard, accompanied by a groan. The door was again and again opened, as the knocks were repeated, with the same result. Being startled, they retired for the night.

As Mr. Brown reached the top of the stairs a hand mill, at a little distance, was seen whirling with great velocity. On seeing the strange sight he seemed only to regret that it was not full of malt. Strange noises were heard in and about the room during the night. These were related to another maid in the morning only to be met with a laugh, and, "What a pack of fools you are!" This was the beginning of these strange noises in the Epworth parsonage.

Subsequently, knocking was heard on the doors, on the bedstead, and at various times in all parts of the house.

Susannah and Ann were one evening below stairs in the dining-room and heard the knockings at the door and overhead. The next night, while in their chamber, they heard knockings under their feet, while no person was in the chamber at the time, nor in the room below. Knockings were heard at the foot of the bed and behind it.

Mr. Wesley says that on the night of the 21st of December, "I was wakened, a little before one o'clock, by nine distinct and very loud knocks, which seemed to be in the next room to ours, with a short pause at every third knock." The next night Emily heard knocks on the bedstead under the bed. She knocked, and it answered her. "I went down stairs," says Mr. Wesley, "and knocked with my stick against the joists of the kitchen. It answered me as loud and as often as I knocked." Knockings were heard under the table, latches of doors were moved up and down as the members of the family approached them. Doors were violently thrust against those who attempted to open or shut them.

When prayer was offered in the evening, by the rector, for the King, a knocking began all around the room, and a thundering knock at the amen. This was repeated at morning and evening, when prayer was offered for the King. Mr. Wesley says, "I have been thrice pushed by an invisible power, once against the corner of my desk in my study, and a second time against the door of the matted chamber, and a third time against the right side of the frame of my study door, as I was going in."

Mr. Poole, the vicar of Haxey, an eminently pious and sensible man, was sent for to spend the night with the family. The knocking commenced about ten o'clock in the evening. Mr. Wesley and his brother clergyman went into the nursery, where the knockings were heard. Mr. Wesley observed that the children, though asleep, were very much affected; they trembled exceedingly and sweat profusely; and, becoming very much excited, he pulled out a pistol and was about to fire it at the place from whence the sound came. Mr. Poole caught his arm and said: "Sir, you are convinced that this is something preternatural. If so, you cannot hurt it, but you give it power to hurt you." Then going close to the place, Mr. Wesley said: "Thou deaf and dumb devil, why dost thou frighten these children, who cannot answer for themselves? Come to me in my study, who am a man." Instantly the particular knock which the rector always gave at the gate was given, as if it would shiver the board in pieces. The next evening, on entering his study, of which no one but himself had the key, the door was thrust against him with such force as nearly to throw him down.

A sound was heard as if a large iron ball was thrown among bottles under the stairs; and as Mr. and Mrs. Wesley were going down stairs they heard a sound as if a vessel of silver were poured upon Mrs. Wesley's breast and ran jingling down to her feet; and at another time a noise as if all the pewter were thrown about the kitchen. But on examination all was found undisturbed.

The dog, a large mastiff, seemed as much disturbed by these noises as the family. On their approach he would run to Mr. and Mrs. Wesley, seeking shelter between them. While the disturbances continued the dog would bark and leap, and snap on one side and on the other, and that frequently before any person in the room heard any noise at all. But after two or three days he used to tremble and creep away before the noise began; and by this the family knew of its approach. Footsteps were heard in all parts of the house, from cellar to garret. Groans and every sort of noise were heard all over the house too numerous to relate. Whenever it was attributed to rats and mice the noises would become louder and fiercer.

These disturbances continued for some four months and then subsided, except that some members of the family were annoyed by them for several years.

Mr. Wesley was frequently urged to quit the parsonage. His reply was eminently characteristic: "No," said he; "let the devil flee from me. I will never flee from the devil."

Every effort was made to discover the cause of these disturbances, but without satisfactory results, save that all believed they were preternatural. The whole family were unanimous in the belief that it was Satanic.

A full account of these noises was prepared from the most authentic sources by John Wesley and published in the Arminian Magazine. Dr. Priestly, an unbeliever, confessed it to have been the best-authenticated and best-told story of the kind that was anywhere extant; and yet, so strongly wedded was he to his materialistic views, he could not accept them, nor find what might be regarded as a common-sense solution of them. He thought it quite probable that it was a trick of the servants, assisted by some of the neighbors, and that nothing was meant by it except puzzling the family and amusing themselves. But Mrs. Wesley and other members of the household declared that the noises were heard above and beneath them when all the family were in the same room.

Dr. Priestly observes in favor of the story that all the parties seemed to have been sufficiently void of fear, and also free from credulity, except the general belief that such things were supernatural. But he claims that "where no good end is answered we may safely conclude that no miracle was wrought."

Mr. Southey replies to Priestly thus: "The former argument would be valid if the term 'miracle' were applicable to the case; but by 'miracle' Mr. Priestly intends a manifestation of divine power, and in the present case no such meaning is supposed, any more than in the appearance of departed spirits. Such things may be preternatural and yet not miraculous; they may be in the ordinary course of nature, and yet imply no alteration of its laws. And in regard to the good end which it may be supposed to answer, it would be end sufficient if sometimes one of those unhappy persons who, looking through the dim glass of infidelity, sees something beyond this life and the narrow sphere of mortal existence, should, from the well-established truth of such a story (trifling and objectless as it may appear), be led to conclude that there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in their philosophy."

Mr. Coleridge finds a satisfactory solution of this knotty question in attributing the whole thing to "a contagious nervous disease" with which he judged the whole family to have been afflicted, "the acme or intensest form of which is catalepsy." The poor dog, it would seem, was as badly afflicted as the rest.

This notion does not need refutation. Dr. Adam Clarke, who collected all the accounts of these disturbances and published them in his "Wesley Family," claims that they are so circumstantial and authentic as to entitle them to the most implicit credit. The eye and ear witnesses were persons of strong understanding and well-cultivated minds, untinctured by superstition and in some instances rather skeptically inclined.

There is but little doubt that these remarkable occurrences at his Epworth home made a deep and lasting impression on John Wesley's mind and life. There was ever present to his mind the reality of an invisible world, and he was convinced that satanic as well as angelic forces were all about us, both to bless and to ruin us if permitted to do so by him who rules all the world.—Central Christian Advocate.

Religion in Germany.

To the Editor:—People who do not subscribe to the dominant religious creeds, so-called, of the present day, will read with some interest, the views of Emperor William, put forth at Aix-La-Chapelle, Prussia, June 20, 1902:

"In these days the young empire is strengthening itself and confidence in it is ever increasing. The mighty German army constitutes the support of the peace of Europe. In conformity with the character of their race, the Germans have kept themselves within bounds, as far as the outside world is concerned. * * * * Every thought of science is first turned to account by us to be afterwards adopted by other nations. This is the world-wide imperium after which Germanic genius strides. * * * *

"I look to all priests and laymen, to help me uphold religion among the people, in order that the German name may preserve its health and strength. This applies equally to the two creeds, Catholic and Protestant.

"It is with pride and joy that I am able to tell you that the pope said to my special ambassador, who went to Rome on the occasion of the holy father's jubilee, that he had always kept a high opinion of the piety of the Germans, and especially of that of the German army. The pope asked my ambassador to tell his sovereign that the country in Europe where control, order and discipline still prevailed, with respect and authority and regard for the church, and where the church could live, was the German empire, and for that the papal see was indebted to the German emperor.

"This justifies me," continued Emperor William, "in saying that our two great creeds must, while living side by side, keep in view their one great aim—to uphold and strengthen the fear of God and reverence for religion. Whether we are moderns, or whether we labor in that or that field, does not matter at all. He who does not found his life on religion is a lost man. I rejoice that I have placed my whole empire, my people and my army, as well as myself and my house, beneath the protection of Him who said: 'Heaven and earth shall pass away, but my word shall not pass away.'"

When the Emperor concluded he called for three cheers for Aix-La-Chapelle.

To us, in free America it looks as if church and state were inseparably connected in Germany. It used to be said that to "fear God and honor the King," was the beginning of wisdom; or words to that effect. But, "All we like sheep, have gone astray; we have turned everyone to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on him the iniquity of us all."—Isaiah 53:6. All this in spite of the pope of Rome and Emperor William. "And if we perish, we perish." C. H. MATHEWS.

ACROSS THE SEA.

And he is dead, you say? and what is "dead?"
Freed from unending toil, unceasing tread?

Outside the granite walls of task and rule?
Away alone, where winds blow soft and cool,

Where one clasps Nature's hand, strong, pure and broad,
Surprised and glad to find the hand of God?

Grown weary of the high noon's oven glow,
Asleep in twilight hush where poppies grow?

And what is death? to steal away at dawn
And let no mortal know that one is gone?

To lift the latch, and, without sad farewells,
Be far upon the way at matin bells?

To turn the light and leave the door ajar
And sail seas silvered by the morning star?

Not dead—just slipped away as from a feast
Ere yet the saffron bloomed along the east;

Stood in the glory of the sun-kissed hill
While the city by the lake dreamed dark and still.

In strength and vigor of that morning breath
Did he look wistful back and think of death?

And did his footsteps linger on the land
When baby fingers took his gentle hand,

Dearer than Rafael's cherubs—they who lean
On dimpled elbows o'er the heights serene?

Nay; heavenward they led with starry eyes,
And evermore he lives in paradise.

He is not dead, but just across the sea,
And even now the children on his knee;

Full in his day, we know, oh, passing fair—
There are so many little children there!
He will not seek the crowded, happy ways,
But some green bank where foaming water plays

Like silver strings of the far-off temple band,
But Christ will come, and smile, and understand.

Or, in the children's garden he will rest,
Just sit and rest—the old love in his breast.

Not dead, just gone away a few short years—
And, yet, November skies drop rain like tears.

He is not dead, but while we smile again
The far-off prairies shine with tears like rain. —Agnes E. Mitchell.

SUBJECTIVE MIND THEORY

And Historical Christianity Considered.

I have read with much interest D. W. Hull's able discourse on the "Subjective Mind," in The Progressive Thinker of June 21. I have no criticism to make of his argument against T. J. Hudson's theory, which, to me, is speculative and unsound. Mr. Hudson sometimes attends Pierre Keeler's light-circle seances, at every one of which the medium's coat comes off in an instant of time while his two hands grasp the arm of the next sitter in the "battery." This performance has been repeated more than two thousand times in the past eighteen years, and no one has ever detected the slightest fraud on the part of Mr. Keeler. He knows no more about how it is done than does any spectator. And how such a performance can be accounted for on the "subjective mind" theory I cannot conceive. My own arm has been grasped by Mr. Keeler on several occasions when sitting next to him in the battery, and I could not detect the slightest movement on his part at the instant when his coat came off, nor does he always know it is off until he sees it thrown over from the cabinet behind him.

But I take issue with Mr. Hull in regard to the date of the composition of the Pauline epistles. In none of the alleged early Christian literature is there any certain clue to dates, or if dates are distinctly given they are false.

Mr. Hull is sure the New Testament was not written at late as the fifteenth century, nor even as late as the fifth; and he gives reasons in favor of an earlier date. More than twenty years ago I discovered the only clue to the date of Paul's epistles to the Corinthians. If he wrote II. Corinthians, xi:33, describing his escape from Damascus when the governor under Aretas the king, kept the city of the Damascenes with a garrison, and desired to apprehend him, the time of the event was certainly before the year 62 B. C. For many years up to that time Aretas of Arabia governed Damascus; and though there were later Arabian kings named Aretas none of them could have governed that city, for the Romans captured it about 62 years B. C., and retained control of it uninterrupted for several successive centuries.

But my more recent researches have convinced me that the Pauline epistles were fabricated by Benedictine monks after the revival of learning, and probably as late as the sixteenth century. I have before me a series of articles printed in the Truth Seeker in December, 1889 and January, 1890, signed "Antichrist," and entitled "Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History—Is It a Modern Forgery?"

This was before I heard of Prof. Edwin Johnson, whose first work, "Antiqua Mater," anonymous, was published in 1887, and whose great work, "The Rise of Christendom," appeared in 1890, but was not seen by me until 1894. Father Hardouin's "Prolegomena," in Latin I had read in 1882, and translated a portion of it for the Truth Seeker. Hardouin's contention was that all the writings of the so-called fathers of the church were fabricated by the Benedictine monks after the renaissance. Already I knew that some of the early Christian literature was of modern origin.

In regard to Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, purporting to have been written in Greek, there is no evidence of its composition prior to the fifteenth century. Its first publication in Latin is claimed to have been in 1474; but the date is not certain. It purported to be a translation by Rufinus from a Greek original. But when, at a later date, a copy of the Greek original came to light, it was so different from Rufinus' Latin copy, purporting to have been made in the fourth century, that commentators had to apologize for its bad Greek. I did not make this a point, but Prof. Johnson did most effectually in a series of articles published in 1893, which I now have. He had access to the various publications of the book and to the extant manuscripts, the best of which are only three in number, none being conjecturally assigned to a date earlier than the twelfth century. His contention is that none of them existed prior to the development of the art of printing, and probably not much earlier than the first publication of the book, about the year 1544. Dates were not given in early printed books. And Prof. Johnson remarks that at that time there were "but a very small number of persons indeed who were reading Latin and Greek, or who were interesting themselves in history of any kind."

In regard to the pretended Greek original, Prof. Johnson who was a thorough classical scholar, says:

"The Greek text is not classical, nor elegant, nor even in many places readable and intelligible. It swarms with words that you cannot find in the lexicon and which are contrary to the genius of the language. There are readers who can enjoy Plato sitting 'with their feet on the fender,' as Macaulay said; who could read the page aloud and be followed easily by fairly instructed students. But to try such an experiment with 'Eusebius' would be to set everybody's teeth on edge. It is not only that the forms and meanings of the words are often unusual, but there are actually a number of novel words, invented by the monks for the purpose of their system. The beautiful language of the great days of Athens seems positively to writhe under the tortures which they inflict upon it. You can hardly believe that a genuine Greek could have been guilty of such deeds."

And he follows with examples of the futile attempt to render the tolerably good Latin into Greek. He declares that the wretched monk did not know the force of his Greek, prepositions. "In short," says he, "this book reminds one of nothing so much as those curious extracts labelled 'English as she is spoke.'"

In my critical examination of dates I found that if they could be trusted it would appear that Eusebius was born before A. D. 247, and was consequently at least seventy-eight years of age in A. D. 325 when the alleged council of Nice was held, and not less than ninety-three years old in A. D. 340, about which time he is supposed to have died.

A scholarly monk of the fifteenth century, engaged in fabricating ancient codices, would be careful to avoid giving an exact clue to the date of the birth and death of the pretended author. This applies to all the Christian literature purporting to belong to the early centuries of our era.

If Eusebius lived in the fourth century and survived the council of Nice some fifteen years, why did he omit to record that important event? Valesius, editor of the Greek text, notes the singular omission. Eusebius is the earliest ecclesiastical historian, and the evidence of the modern fabrication of his works being conclusive, it necessarily follows that the writings of the church fathers before him are spurious.

The evidence of coins is fatal to the existence of Christianity, during at least the first six centuries of our era. "The earliest Christian coin of the empire," says "Nummus," in an able article on ancient coins, in the Truth Seeker of June 21, "is the golden solidus of Justinian, A. D. 750." But this coin, stamped with a crucifix and the words, "Dominus Justinianus Servus Christi," is most certainly spurious. Justinian II., horribly named Rhinometus, grasps the cross, which rests on a step, presumably of an altar. Or we see a globe surmounted by a cross, and inscribed Pax (Peace). Or the right hand of Christ, as king of kings, is raised in the act of blessing. A book is also seen, doubtless intended for the book of the Gospels.

So says Prof. Johnson in "Rise of Christendom, and after showing the absurdity of the false coinage he concludes:

"Under such conditions of evidence we may applaud the prudence of Buonani, who appeared to hold that no coins before Boniface VIII (1291) can be trusted, and who begins his collection from Martin V. (1415). It may now be assumed that none are genuine before the latter date."

The ecclesiastical historians even claim Philip (244-249) as the first Christian emperor, based on the year 244 being the thousandth of the city of Rome. This statement, together with the conventional story of Philip's submission to clerical domination in Eusebius' Ecclesiastical History, is sufficient self-refutation, says Prof. Johnson; "but a coin of Philip with the inscription 'Ex oraculo Apollinis' clearly proves that he was an adherent of the old cult."

"Nummus," in the Truth Seeker says:

"The worship of Hesus prevailed throughout Gaul from about the first century before to about the fifth century after the Christian era, when it was carried into Italy by the barbarian hordes who assaulted the declining empire of Rome."

And he adduces evidence from coinage of the worship of Serapis, of Issu (evidently, he says, the same as the Gaulish Hesus), and of Ies Chrisna from India. But any medieval coin with the inscription Christus, purporting to antedate the fifteenth century, is doubtless a monkish fraud. IHS, the Greek name of Bacchus, is falsely interpreted by Catholics to stand for Jesus Hominum Salvator. The Greek capital H is the Roman E, and the pronunciation of the name is Yes.

A. SCHOPENHAUER ESSAYS.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75 cents. "Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophic writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

OUR ECLECTIC MAGAZINE

. . . OF . . .

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

WAS IT TELEPATHY

That Led This Officer to the Criminal He Sought?

"There are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamed of in our philosophy," says the Indianapolis (Ind.) Sun.

I do not undertake to explain the happenings I am about to relate on any theory of mind transmission or any other hypothesis. I will merely make a statement of the occurrences and leave the solution to the reasonings of my readers.

A good many years ago I was in pursuit of a notorious criminal whom we will call Sanders, and one who had given me a great deal of trouble in doubling backwards and forwards in his efforts to elude capture, but I finally discovered that he was heading for Indianapolis, where I came at once, stopping on my arrival at the Spencer House, opposite the Union Station.

The mother of this man had previously lived in my town, was a well-known police character, and had recently moved to this city. It was at her home I expected to find the fugitive. From the well-known propensities of the old lady to get into trouble with the police department, I apprehended no trouble in locating her, but to my disappointment I found that her locality, or presence, in the city was entirely unknown to the officers, and I put in several days of arduous labor, assisted by the members of the force, in an effort to discover her whereabouts.

One night, returning late to my room at the hotel, after an unsuccessful day's search, I procured my key at the office and went up to my room thoroughly worn out, and not a little discouraged at my nonsuccess. I awoke in the morning and proceeded to dress. Pulling on my boots—boots were generally worn at that time, instead of the now universally adopted shoe—the leather tongue which run up over the instep from the foot to the morocco top then in vogue, hurt my instep very much, causing me to limp perceptibly as I descended the staircase to the breakfast room.

While the proprietor and clerks of the house had no idea of my identity or mission, I had become pretty well acquainted. Not feeling in my usual form that morning it struck me that a little appetizer might be of advantage before beginning my morning meal. Approaching the office I perceived a clerk on duty at that time who had been especially courteous and agreeable. I made known to him my wants and asked if he would accompany me to the buffet and join me in a drink before taking my repast. To this he readily assented, and together we approached the white-coated dispenser of liquid refreshments and made known to him our desires. The clerk called for a cocktail and I ordered the same, after which I entered the dining-room and ordered beefsteak and breakfast bacon. It struck me at the time that it was the finest bacon I had ever eaten. After finishing a very hearty breakfast I returned to the office, procured a cigar, lighted it, walked to the front entrance, which faced Illinois street, stood there a moment and then walked slowly towards Washington street. I had not been in the city long enough to become familiar with many of the streets, but I knew I was then on Illinois street, and that the main thoroughfare above was Washington. I turned west, continued my stroll on the south side of the street, went past the old State House, which stood in about the same locality as the new one now does. Thus far the street was familiar, as I had taken several trips to the State offices, but further than this I had never been. I kept on, however, in this direction, enjoying my morning cigar, until I came to a canal bridge, over which I crossed, and, after standing a few minutes on the bridge, quietly viewing the scene on either bank, I walked to the end and turned up a small street which ran parallel to the water, the canal on one side and a row of houses on the other. I observed the dilapidated condition of the dwellings in this vicinity, and the broken sidewalks and fences, which indicated the class of people who generally inhabited that part of the city. I strolled along slowly for some distance until I came to a house which was built with wide boards running up and down in the place of being weatherboarded, having narrow strips over the cracks between the boards. The house was somewhat higher than those in its immediate vicinity, and stood with the gable end toward the sidewalk. Just as I reached the gate opposite, the door opened and old Mrs. Sanders, the woman I was looking for, came out. I stopped at once and placed my hand on the gate, pulling it open, when I awoke, and found to my great surprise I was in bed. I could not understand how this could be, the occurrence was so real. In fact, the top of the gate where I had rested my hand was old and decayed, presenting a rough and uneven surface, and when I laid my hand upon it I felt the rough wood up against the palm. This feeling I had when I awoke, and my instep, which had been paining me from the tongue of my boot, still hurt me. I turned in bed and felt of myself to see if there was not some mistake, but there I was beyond any doubt.

I arose, and going to the blinds opened them, and found that it was after daylight, so I proceeded to dress. My foot hurt me very much when I pulled on my boot, and I could not get down the stairway without limping perceptibly. The strangeness of this struck me and I resolved, on entering the office, that if I should see the same clerk I had dreamed about, to follow out the impression. I cannot say that I was surprised on seeing the familiar face which had come to me, behind the counter, and I immediately extended the invitation, which he accepted smilingly. I ordered a cocktail, and he followed, after which I entered the dining-room and ordered beefsteak and breakfast bacon, but it really was not good, as I felt as though I had just eaten a meal and the flavor of the very fine breakfast bacon I had just partaken of was fresh to my taste. I finished my repast, got a cigar and followed along the route of which I had dreamed and walked until I came to the canal bridge, which was an exact counterpart of the one I thought I had passed over. The houses along the canal was also the same, even to the broken down fence and neglected sidewalk. I found the woman in the locality where I had seen her and succeeded in securing my man.

Some time after this I was on a trip down in the Wabash bottom after a murderer. There was no reason why this man should think of me especially from the many other officers in his part of the country. I had entered his bedroom a short time after midnight, finding him fast asleep, and was informed by him when he awoke that he was dreaming of my being there at his bedside after him.

On one other occasion I had been out some distance in the country trying to get a trace of some violators of the law, and was pursuing my way along a path which skirted some heavy timber, with no thought of danger in my mind, when suddenly the impression came to me not to pass close to a certain clump of bushes beside the path, so I quickly took an oblique direction across the road to the other side. I was fired at from this ambush and escaped injury, when, had I kept along the path, my chance would have been extremely slim. I had passed many as favorable places for a concealed assailant as this with no thought of danger.

As I said in the beginning, I have no explanation to offer. These three occurrences were of a different character, all on the same line. Was the dream I had at the hotel transmitted to me from the mind of the others, and were my thoughts when actively engaged in locating the man in the Wabash bottom received by him, and what was it that put the thought in my mind the last time?

CAPT. TOM HALLS.

Talked Through Trumpets.

There was a trumpet seance at 32 West Second street, last night, at which Medium Charles Barnes, from Marion, Indiana, presided.

The circle comprised fourteen persons—seven males and the same number of females. The room was darkened. There was a stand in the middle of the circle, on which was a dulcimer, a bell and an aluminum trumpet. This latter was of the pattern through which spirits are wont to convey messages—so alleged.

Medium Barnes placed the sitters, while sitting himself between two of the party. All took hold of hands to form the battery. Mr. Barnes' hands were clasped by the two on either side of him. The stand mentioned was in the center and away from the reach of either the medium, or any of the sitters.

Soon after the light was extinguished, voices began to come through the trumpet—wherever they came from. What purported to be the spirits of little girls, whose mammas were in the circle, came. These appeared to talk to the latter, who recognized them in every case.

One supposed spirit was that of a man, who in earthly form had been a railroad brakeman. One of the gentlemen present had been with the supposed spirit and was on the same engine that ran over him, when his spirit passed out.

"I know that is Jim," said the ex-railroader (one of the sitters). "It is his voice and I could tell it from a million. He was killed before my eyes. How are y', Jim?" he exclaimed, in a joyful tone of voice.

"How are you, old chum?" said Jim's spirit; the tone sounding rather hearty. "Remember the day I was done for?"

"Indeed I do," said the ex-railroader. "I shall never forget it. Are you happy over there, Jim?"

"As happy as I can be," responded the ancient brakeman.

Other voices came through the trumpet to others in the circle, and all were recognized, and short reminiscences indulged in. Then, for a change—but by request of the medium—a tune was played on the harp from the stand.

"We would ask you—if you have strength enough," said the medium, "to raise the harp in the air. Let it float over our heads. The company will please tighten their grasps of hands and concentrate their thoughts on raising the harp off the table."

In a half minute the harp was heard above the heads of the sitters, in various parts of the room—from corners; directly overhead; then from the floor. All this time the strings were being swept by invisible hands, and the music was well executed. Whoever played the instrument was a fine musician. Suddenly the music ceased, the harp dropped with a thud into the lap of a gentleman. He was startled—as well he might be.

That was, perhaps, the most startling of all the manifestations.

To-night, Medium Barnes will give a seance with light room and says he will materialize from spirit shapes. Or, rather, from the forces which the spirits will gather. If Mr. Barnes can do this, he is a wonder, as the skeptic might say.—Daily Paper, Erie, Pa.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold. Keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for nineteen (19) two cent stamps, which is only the actual cost of the samples, postage, etc.

MISSOURIAN TELLS OF STRANGE ADVENTURE IN MARTINIQUE—ENTERS CAVERN IN MONT PELEE AND ENCOUNTERS A STRANGE CREATURE—GOLD EXPOSED IN UNDERGROUND CHAMBER.

St. Joseph, Mo.—William J. Howard, who lived five years on Martinique Island, has returned to his home here and tells a story of Mont Pelee that is more wonderful than the fact that it has been in eruption for some time and has killed thousands of people. Howard says he was guided to a cave in Mont Pelee nearly three years ago by a native of the island and that he saw tons and tons of gold in the cave.

"And that is not all," added Howard. "I saw the evil one in that cave, if there is a devil anywhere in the universe of worlds. I am not superstitious. I have no belief in any kind of religion and I never believed until that time that there was a Satan, but I saw something in that cavern that would shake any man's fixed ideas about such things. It is almost beyond belief, I will admit, but it is all a fact."

Howard left the West Indies more than two years ago and has been in Alaska since then. His father and mother live here and he has come home to remain with them several months. He is a gold hunter and has made several rich finds in the Western mining country. Several years ago he bought for his parents a home in this city and has since kept them supplied with money. He has traveled all over the world in search of gold, and if the story he tells of Martinique is true he has seen more precious metal than any other living man.

"I first went to St. Pierre about seven years ago," said Howard. "I did not go there in search of gold, but was wandering about to see the world. I liked the place and decided to remain a while. At that time it was an ideal spot for a man to spend his life. The drowsy atmosphere of the island was charming to me and I enjoyed life there as I had never enjoyed it before. I was on the island the best part of five years in all.

GUIDED TO DEVIL'S CAVE.

"After I had been there a year or two I met a man known by the name of Jocks, who claimed to be a native of Martinique, but whom I always believed to have come from some other place. He was a Creole, but I do not think he was born on the island. He was too active. He spoke the French language and not a word of English. One night he told me about a cave on the far side of Mont Pelee and said the devil lived there.

"I paid little attention to his story at first, but he kept telling me more about it as we became better acquainted and I became interested in it. I began to believe the story of the cave, but of course took no stock in the devil part of it. I decided to see the cave and explore it, so I learned from Jocks the exact location of the place. I went out alone and looked for it, but found nothing.

"Then I intimated to Jocks that he was lying to me, and he said he would take me to the cave. I set a time for the visit to the mysterious place and fixed it so that we would arrive there in the night, but Jocks would not go. He would only go in daylight, so we arranged to start before daylight one morning. We arrived on the side of the mountain about three o'clock in the afternoon, and after a long search Jocks showed me a place in a little ravine where he said the entrance to the cave could be found. He held aloof and I searched the ravine, but there was no opening. I finally persuaded Jocks to show the entrance to me. He was shivering with fright, but went close enough to show me a rock which he said covered the entrance and then fled. It was the last time I ever saw him.

"I tried to move the rock by pulling it or pushing it, but it appeared to be as solid as any other rock in the side of the mountain. While working at it I gave it a sidewise twist and it moved out of its fixed place, showing an opening large enough for a man to enter. I crawled into the opening, expecting to find nothing more than a small cavern. I had not prepared myself to make much of an exploration, having no candle or lantern with me, but I used matches and kept going in as far as I could. I was surprised to see that the cavern grew larger and in a short time I noticed that it was lighter. I had become accustomed to the darkness, of course, but the strange light was a puzzle to me.

FINDS GOLD IN CAVERN.

"I kept on going, passing through cavern after cavern, until I came to one that was about 800 feet square. I had no light, but I could see everything in the cave. It was a beautiful place and I stood looking at it a long time before I noticed the heap of what I at first supposed to be rocks in the center.

"I examined this heap and found that it was gold—gold in lumps as large as a boulder and in smaller lumps the size of a peck measure. There was ton upon ton of it—more gold than has been seen in all the world before. I tried to lift one of the smaller nuggests, but it was too heavy. I scraped it with my knife to be sure that it was really gold.

"It was such a stupendous pile of gold that I was awed and not in the least excited. As I stood there I saw a blue and green flame at one side of the cave, and then I noticed a man—or what I at first supposed to be a man—standing there. I took a good look at this being, and at that time I believed that I was looking at the evil one.

"This monstrous being—spirit or whatever it was—stood near one corner of the cave. He was larger than an ordinary man. The body appeared to be covered with hair. I could see horns on the head and hoofs where the feet should be. Perhaps my early education had something to do with furnishing all these features—I am not certain about that. I am certain that I saw something there and that I saw the gold.

"When the evil one—or whatever it was—made a motion to me to come to him I went at once. I had no fear at that time. The terror of the place seized upon me later, and I have never been able since to shake it off entirely. I stood face to face with this form and looked as I believed then on the features of Old Nick.

APPEARANCE OF OLD NICK.

"The face was covered with black hair, coming to a point at the chin like a beard. The eyes were very much like those of a human, but the short horns growing from the top of the forehead dispelled the idea at once that it was a human face. The limbs were long and the nails were like claws. It was a glistening body that I looked upon. I was pushed into a corner of the cave and the being beside me manipulated something at his side that turned on a stream of light or flame, which shot across the cave.

"This stream appeared to have no substance, but it was 10,000 times as hot as any fire on earth it seemed to me. It was more like a searchlight and about the size of a stream from a street hydrant. He turned it upon the heap of gold and the boulders of yellow metal were melted like tallow in a hot fire. I saw the yellow metal run on the bottom of the cave. I could not breathe the stifling air and fell down unconscious.

"When I regained consciousness there was the same dim light in the cave I had seen when I first entered. The heap of gold was still there and the melted gold was on the floor of the cave. After groping around several hours I found the opening and left the place more dead than alive. I did not bring away any of the gold except the few shavings that I found in my knife, but they were enough to convince me that I had not been dreaming and that it was actually gold that I had seen. I had no proof of anything else I had seen in the cave except my recollection. When I left the cave I pushed the rock back in its place and finally reached St. Pierre again. Jocks never appeared there again to my knowledge, although he may have been somewhere on the island. I never learned how he got his information about what was in the cave, and if he knew there was gold in it he never intimated it to me. Although I had no fear while I was in the cave a sort of terror seized me after I was safe outside, and I suffered from it so much that I was thrown into a fever, from which I lay ill several months. I never went back to the cave again and had no desire to get possession of any of the gold there. I left Martinique as soon as I could get away and I never intend to return."

Howard was born in St. Joseph and lived here until he was grown, when he went west and became a miner. He has traveled all over the world and is known as a mine expert.—Chicago Chronicle.

God's Creatures Set to Fighting Each Other.

Washington, D. C.—On the theory that it is the part of wisdom to set a thief to catch a thief, the Agricultural Department has determined to set a bug to destroy a bug. Among the recent importations from China was a colony of insects which, it is hoped, will put an end to the scale pest so injurious to the fruit industry of the country. There has been much complaint from many regions of late years of the ravages of the so-called San Jose scale—a pest supposed to have been imported originally from the Orient.

Throughout great areas in the Eastern part of the United States the San Jose scale bug has been devastating orchards to an alarming extent. Trees attacked by it become literally covered with a whitish scaly substance that exudes from the insects, and, being sucked dry of their sap, soon perish.

Apparently the mischief spreads with such rapidity because the bug has no natural enemies in this country and that is why the Department of Agriculture sent one of its most expert entomologists, Mr. Marlatt, to the far East to look for something that would devour the destroyer.

Will some orthodox divine descant on this feature of God's universal kingdom? What right has puny man to set God's creatures to destroying each other? If God created all the different insects, etc., why encourage them to fight? This is more cruel and more heartless than the water treatment applied to the Filipinos.

UNCONQUERED.

However skilled and strong art thou, my foe,
However fierce is thy relentless hate,
Though firm thy hand and strong thy aim, and straight
Thy poisoned arrow leaves the bended bow
To pierce the target of my heart, ah! know
I am the master yet of my own fate.
Thou canst not rob me of my best estate,
Though fortune, fame and friends—yea, love shall go.

Not to the dust shall my true self be hurled.
Nor shall I meet thy worst assaults dismayed.
When all things in the balance are well weighed,
There is but one great danger in the world:
Thou canst not force my soul to wish thee ill—
That is the only evil that can kill.

SPIRITUALISM AS IT IS.

As Viewed by a Christian Spiritualist.

Spiritualism, as I understand it, is not confined to the people that call themselves Spiritualists, but it is found in all religious beliefs more or less. Among orthodox believers Spiritualism is looked upon with a certain amount of disdain. The great trouble is, so few people will give it a hearing unbiased by previous judgment. The phenomena seems to be the first great stumbling-block to many, while it is to the Spiritualist the foundation stone whereon is builded the most comforting religion that has ever been given to earth. There is nothing in this world of ours that is counterfeited, but what is good. So when so many people do by fraud and illicit means the things the teachers and mediums of true Spiritualism do, you may rest assured they do those things because they are worth doing. I can see but little difference in the days of old when God spoke to his children, and now when he bids some spiritual person speak to some one of earth. And as in the olden times God did not speak to every one, but had a chosen few to give to the rest his words and commands, as then, so now. Not every believer in the doctrine of Spiritualism can hear or see the spiritual messengers, but to some is given the power so they may in turn hand down the words from the hidden land beyond.

To some Spiritualism is but a science. To me and to many others it is a religion, a well-spring of joy bursting from the Fountain Head of all Good, descending at times upon us as a torrent of rain, deluging us with its greatness, its peace and love.

There is much said of late in regard to "Christian Spiritualism." I must say I belong to those people. The word "Christian" means Christ-like. Who that wants to live a good helpful life, would not like to be Christ-like? Who does not look to Christ as the one perfect man. It is wiser to copy after the best, and fall short, than to take a poor model, and still fall below. Then there is Paul, the greatest of all preachers; his writings would lead you to think he believed in spiritual people and gifts given to earthly people by their aid. Was he not a Christian?

To understand the religion of the Spiritualists, one must begin at the beginning and search diligently all pertaining to it as best they can, until with the knowledge will come the inner conviction that when a men dies, he is only born anew, and as he has lived while in the earthly body, so he must begin in the spiritual. And I believe such a conviction will come to any one that will study Spiritualism as it is. Not as some people say it is, but the deep, all-absorbing theme of immortal life.

Earth people are so quick to come to a conclusion, and anything decided in their minds is settled. I think it is a good thing to be a "doubting Thomas" once in a while. When we doubt we will think, and to think is to progress, and no good was ever done by non-progressive people. A person that has no belief in a future life is apt to be the quickest to detect a flaw in any religious belief. Not in the belief, exactly, but in the person that advocates that belief; and they most invariably choose one that has only received the first lesson in immortality. To me there are many Spiritualists. Some (I have met them) think any one can do all sorts of things and still be a Spiritualist; no doubt he can, but what kind of a Spiritualist? Do you call a man that has a belief in Spiritualism, that swears, lies, cheats, uses alchoholic drinks, gambles, and so on, a good man? Is he a help to humanity? Is he making the earth and her people better for having lived here? Does he help the cause he professes to believe in any? Does he attract good spirits, so they through him may help the oppressed? Nay! It were better for the cause had he never been born.

There is a vast field for improvement in the first grade of Spiritualism, and I am glad that many see the need of more upright lives, and recognize that the world at large will always look at a person's life, both private and public, to judge his religion. Let us so live that we may by our actions cause people to make no slighting remark of our religious belief. It seems to be a foregone conclusion among many, that if you have a belief in Spiritualism, you must forsooth do many evil, uncanny things. Peace be with you.

FIDELITY.

I do not want you when your feet
With buoyant footsteps tread on air,
And you can smile on all you meet,
And banish care;
But when the road is long and cold,
And cruel seem the ways of men,
And you are weary, sad and old—
Come then.

I do not want you when your name
From lip to lip is proudly rolled,
I do not want you when your fame
Has brought you gold;
But when you fight, and strive, and press,
And no one reads the songs you pen,
And life is full of loneliness—
Come then.

Is a wonderful book, being the personal experiences of a man whose dead sweetheart, after appearing to him many times, etherealized materialized and through trance mediums, has him put into a hypnotic trance by spirit scientists and held in that condition for ten days, which time he spends with her in the celestial spheres and then returns to earth with perfect recollection of what he saw and heard in that realm of the so-called dead. He tells his wonderful story to his friend who gives it to the world in his best style. This friend is Dr. T. A Bland, the well-known author, scientist and reformer. This book has a brilliant introduction by that distinguished preacher, Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. SATURDAY, JULY 5, 1902.

Rome Shows Her Hand.

Recent news from Washington indicates that there is a serious block in the negotiations between our government and the vatican pertaining to the Spanish "friars" and lands. According to press reports, the vatican seems singularly ignorant of the American system. Gov. Taft, representing this government, wires that the Roman Catholic authorities are not as amiably inclined toward the proposition of this government respecting the disposal of the friars' land as it was hoped by those in charge of the important mission.

The church has sent a long communication by cable to the effect that the lands will be transferred under certain virtual restrictions, and it is suggested, among other things, that the church be permitted to exercise a supervision over the primary schools of the islands. This proposition does not meet with the favor of Gov. Taft, who has reported his position on the matter and has asked for further instructions from Washington.

It is understood that Mr. Root shares with Gov. Taft this view of the proposition made at Rome. The secretary of war goes so far in his determination to have settled the question of the friars' lands without the introduction of irrelevant propositions that he is disposed to send to Gov. Taft a communication which will embody what amounts to an ultimatum, which will be presented to the authorities at Rome, couched in diplomatic terms, of course.

This position on the part of the Roman Catholic authorities is not a surprise. It was expected there would be some delay in settling the question and that there would be occasion for negotiation and discussion.

Of course the old medieval Spanish system of Romish control of everything is dear to the papal heart. Rome views free public schools, without Romish teachers and priestly supervision, as inimical to churchly interests; and therein it is correct, for free unbiased general education is undoubtedly inimical to superstition and churchly authority over education, morals and government.

It is well, and instructive, that Rome shows its hand in this unmistakable manner; thereby many will discern more clearly the animus of Romanism.

It is to be hoped that our government will settle the matter in full and strict accordance with American principles, whether the vatican is willing or not.

Miss Abby A. Judson.

It appears from the Newark (N. J.) News that in an unpretentious cottage in Arlington, with a foxterrier as her sole companion, lives Miss Abby A. Judson, the well-known Spiritualist, whose writings upon the subject of her belief are acknowledged by its partisans to be authorities. She comes of a family well known in the religious world, and during the sixty-seven years of a busy life she has made her mark in the educational field, besides devoting years to the cause of Spiritualism. Because of an eye disease Miss Judson has, of late, been unable to do much writing outside of the contribution of weekly articles to a Spiritualistic paper published in Boston.

Miss Judson received her education at Bradford Academy, Massachusetts, and at private schools in Hanover, N. H., Providence, Philadelphia and New York. From 1856 to 1876 she taught in various schools. After a year's travel in Europe she resumed teaching, taking a position at College Hill, Ohio. Later she went to Minneapolis, and founded there the Judson Female Institute, which she carried on for eleven years. She became a Spiritualist in 1887.

After disposing of her seminary in 1890 Miss Judson devoted herself to the giving of private lessons and to laboring for the cause of Spiritualism. She made a lecture tour of the principal cities in the United States, and her addresses aroused the enthusiasm of the believers in Spiritualism.

To a News reporter, who visited her at her home on Davis avenue, she talked enthusiastically of her belief. She declares that all her writings are done under spiritual guidance. Her method of putting herself in condition to receive this aid she described as follows:

"When ready to write I deaden my doorbell, darken my study with closed curtains and then play on my organ until I see beautiful waves of magnetic light. I then go to my desk, raise a curtain just enough to enable myself to see the writing paper and write, sometimes whole sentences without conscious effort." She stated that her lecture on "Why She Became a Spiritualist" was written out and prepared for the compositor in six or seven hours. She added that those who know the manual labor, besides the mental work required in writing a book would see that this could not be accomplished so rapidly without outside aid.

Text: What Is the Good of Spiritualism, Anyway?

This is a frequent question asked by those who have no conception of its all-potent power for good when properly understood and utilized. Inter-communion between the two worlds is only a small part of Spiritualism, yet a most important one, often attended by results of the highest value. We always discourage the practice of depending on spirits to guide and advise as to worldly matters and deprecate the too common practice of running to mediums for tips on stocks, grain and horse-races as well as appealing to spirits to help in every business emergency. Yet that there are times when spirit friends can and do assist those in dire distress, or for purposes above and beyond the mere selfish interests of those aided, is not questioned by any one who has studied the subject. An instance has lately come to our knowledge for the truth of which we can unreservedly vouch, where a poor old mother was helped out of her distress by the aid of a son in spirit life.

A lady who has been a resident of Chicago for more than twenty-five years, well known in former years as a brilliant member of fashionable circles, became convinced some fifteen years ago of the truth of Spiritualism. Gradually she developed clairvoyance and clairaudience, frequently seeing and describing spirits and as frequently hearing spirit voices. That these experiences were not mere vagaries of the mind has often been proven by the most incontestible evidence. For convenience we will call her Mrs. B., because that is not her name, and because she would shrink from any publicity being given her philanthropic spirit and charity work. Her heart is ever reaching out to the poor, the sick and the oppressed. With a heart full to overflowing with gratitude we often recall her kindness to us when in the winter of 1885-6 we lay week after week in a sickroom suffering as only one can suffer who has bankrupted his nervous system and must endure the long and tedious process of recuperation. During that unusually cold winter this delicate, great hearted woman came regularly through the storms and biting winds a distance of several miles to bring us rare flowers from the hot-house, and, what was infinitely more grateful and health giving, the fragrance and healing power of her own sweet uplifting influence. And scores of people in this city, many of whom never heard of her until like an angel of hope and comfort she appeared in their presence, bless her as we do. She is not rich in this world's goods; indeed, only by strict economy and self-denial can she venture to expend money in her work, but in spiritual forces her supply is unlimited and the more she draws the greater is her ability to enlarge the draft. For a time Mrs. B. had been on a protracted visit with friends in New England, and so busy at her altruistic work, even there, that she rarely writes her old friends or speaks of what she is doing. In writing to an intimate lady friend in Chicago she recounted an incident illustrative of the practical good of spirit communion in relieving distress. The letter was shown to us. It is plainly apparent that the good woman never for a moment thought of taking any credit to herself but told the story as a third person might have done, solely to demonstrate how a spirit may guard and protect those dear to him. We feel impelled to give the story to our readers just as written in a familiar way to her friend, and here it is:

"I think I did not write you a little experience I had just before I left Boston. I had been shopping with E. all the morning and came home to dine at two o'clock, her usual hour. I was very tired. After dinner I found it necessary to see my sewing woman who lived across Dartmouth street bridge. I felt too weary to walk and concluded to take two lines of cars. I came out to the sidewalk and heard in emphatic tones the word 'walk!' I started like an arrow, turned upon Dartmouth street and was nearing Commonwealth avenue when I saw a woman of perhaps 65 approaching me. She would go a little distance and stop. Presently I saw the spirit form of a young man who was urging her to speak to me. I walked towards her and she asked me if I knew where she could obtain work. I asked what she could do, and her reply was, 'clean house, sew and scrub floors.' I said, 'you are too old and not strong enough to scrub floors.' I stood upon the walk with her for nearly two hours and ascertained her history. As I was leaving she said, 'I did not want to speak to you, but my son made me.' I asked where her son was; she said he had been in spirit life for three years. I told her I saw him urging her to come to me. She was overjoyed and said, 'I am so glad, for my friends call me insane. I told her I would go to her home. I went, accompanied by my son, and found her absent, but a daughter of 18 was at home and a great invalid. We questioned her and found that the reports of mother and daughter corresponded exactly. As I left, I said mentally, 'If this work is for me, do not allow it to pass from my mind.' I was awakened at midnight and immediately found myself planning for the needs of the family. I had only two or three days before leaving. I sent for the woman to come and see me, and when she came I gave her money and clothing to relieve immediate wants. The woman said, with the money she could pay her rent and get food and fuel. 'Oh,' said she, 'I was wild to think my son was to leave me and he said to me, "Mother, God is merciful, and I am sure he will let me come back and minister to you," and it is my son who saw that you would help me.' She said that prior to his leaving he used to sit with her evenings when she was sewing, as she had to sew at that time, being engaged during the day. He would sit at the table, and with the ends of his fingers drum tunes upon it. The mother, worn and weary, would say nervously, 'Oh, Edgar, don't make that noise.' He would answer, 'Mother, don't drive me away, for when I am what you call dead I shall come back and make myself known to you in that way.' After he had been gone three months she was sitting alone sewing one evening when she heard the familiar airs upon the table. On hearing this experience I said, 'You can afford to let your friends call you insane. You have the knowledge; when they have suffered what you have, revelations may be given them. Hold fast to your knowledge and do not falter; ministering spirits will relieve your needs.' She was quite anxious to send her daughter to an uncle in Nova Scotia who was a farmer; he would keep her a year. Having only twenty-four hours to think about that and much to do for myself, I said audibly, when alone, 'If I am to aid, open the way, and I will do the work.' I could think of little else, still no way opened. I rode to the station and was seated in the car, feeling that some one else must do that work, when a wealthy friend came in and took a seat with me. I related my story and she said, 'If you will do the work, I will furnish the money.' I accepted, and through my son did the work. The girl is at her uncle's, improving from day to day, and I have had two letters from her. Need we ask what good can come from Spiritualism?"

Orthodox and Spiritualist Ideas of Hell Contrasted.

Here follow extracts from Prof. Joseph Bautz's book, "Die Hoelle," which bears the "imprimatur" of the bishop of Mayence and other church authorities.

"Hell is derived from 'Hel,' the name given to the goddess of the lower regions. All people in ancient times believed in 'Hel' administering punishment for sins committed on earth, that punishment being eternal or temporary.

"St. Justius says: 'If there is no hell

"St. Justinius says: 'If there is no hell, there is no God, or if there is one it is a God who cares neither for the human race nor for virtue, nor does he hate vice.'

"Many fathers of the church maintain that devils do not enter hell until after judgment day, and many saints are of opinion that the souls of the dead, whether they were intended for heaven, or hell, remain in temporary abode until then.

"The punishments of hell are extremely painful, and the circumstance that, after judgment day, the devil has no place to go outside of hell, is very hard on the sinners. After the resurrection, the body, as well as the soul of the sinner, is installed in hell. Soul and body are constantly burning, without being consumed. As St. Thomas says: 'Death flees from the poor souls.' The grades of the punishment differ according to the number and character of sins charged against the soul. All sins are classified and each sinner receives exactly the amount of punishment due.

"The view of some theologians that God baptizes dying children who are in the state of hereditary sin, or causes them to wish for baptism, and thus saves them, is not borne out by the teachings of the church or tradition. Unbaptized children are eternally punished; they go to hell, but they are not so badly punished as actual sinners. They undergo the punishment of the damned, but only with their souls, not with their bodies. Pope Innocent III. and Pius VI. thus decided.

"All fathers of the church and catholic theologians agree that the fire of hell in no way differs from earthly fire. Calvin, the reformer, also took that view. God has often inflicted punishment by fire, even on this earth. Think of Sodom and Gomorrah, the sons of Aaron, etc. Goerres says that the devil and other damned (under assistance of the devil) when assuming bodily form, often breathe fire and sulphur. The old testament and the new both pronounce the hellish fire the equivalent of earthly fire. The first is, in part, kept up by the bodies on which it feeds. From other sources we learn that God 'made the fire.' He created it when the angels fell. The fire burns, but gives no light. God keeps it going for all eternity. Its intensity is immeasurable. It feeds on gases and chemicals floating in the center of the earth in never-ending rotation. St. Thomas is very outspoken with regard to the hellish fire. From the standpoint of natural science we may assume that the hellish fire is simply a gas or a mixture of gases set afire and kept afire by God's power. The sinners are kept in hell, in a certain portion of it, to which they are held fast by invisible chains."—Kansas City Star.

Until the advent of Spiritualism the world was held to the fiery furnace of an eternal hell, a lake of fire into which all unrepentant sinners were to be cast. Those who could not believe, as a rule entertained some fear lest it be true.

The great mass of humanity were mad with fear of the wrath of an Omnipotent God, an All-Wise Creator, a Ruler over all and in all, even in the Devil and in Hell, until the rationalism of Spiritualism dawned; until reason took the place of faith and fear; until that peddler came and spoke through those innocent little children and the a, b, c's they had just learned at school. This opened the door of life, unbarred the prison of the soul and gave the world, the people of the earth a view of the real future, and with that view put out the fires of a literal hell, and destroyed the personal God and Devil.

Messages from those long thought dead told tales more reasonable, reiterated what the inspiration of advanced thinkers, whose names are familiar to every student of the spiritual philosophy, had already given and got into print: That the literal hell was a farce and that there were but the immutable laws of nature governing the universe; involution and evolution; cause and effect; eternal energy, a principle in all and over all that takes no particular cognizance of a volcanic eruption or tornado that destroys thousands of lives, any more than of the sparrow's fall.

Spiritualism's hell and heaven are conditions of darkness and temporary obscurity, and light and happiness, or satisfaction with one's acts for right.

Hell is a condition that is produced by the acts and thoughts of the spirit. Selfishness, hate, jealousy, envy, acts and words that make darkness, even momentary, for others, and everything the conscience and reason teach as wrong, produce a state of gloom and darkness for the spirit, which darkness is but the crucible of refinement and purification in life's eternal evolving plan.

Heaven is a condition of delight and satisfaction, the effect of a knowledge of right doing according to the highest conception of the spirit; a consciousness of having been true and just in thought, word and deed toward all beings.

Neither hell nor heaven is eternal unless we make it so by our eternal wrong or right toward associate spirits.

There are many in the ranks of Spiritualism who place much stress upon the efficacy of prayer as a means of lifting the cloud from the soul, caused by a wrong word or deed, but only as the prayer or thought wave reaches the wronged one and a complete reconciliation, a perfect forgiveness, is had, will there be any effect realized from the prayer, or aspiration.

The clouds of hell can only be brushed away by the growth and right living and doing of the individual, and then, but not till then, can the "light of heaven be shed abroad in his heart," according to the spiritualistic view.

The universe contains no special place of confinement or torture for those who are only damned by Pope or priests, or ministers; nor heaven and "great white throne" for the self-appointed elect, or self-chosen perfect of the human spirits, mortal or immortal. The world no longer believes such stuff now, and but few are so ignorant as to advocate such doctrine.

Delays in Prof. Lockwood's Book.

When Prof. Lockwood announced the anticipated publication of his book on "The Continuity of Life," he fully expected to be able to compile it from manuscript already on hand, but found to his surprise that the labor of transcribing it in suitable form for a treatise of this kind would take as much time as to write the work anew throughout. This has been no small task, as the reader will comprehend when reading the work. Lecturing on an average of nearly four times a week, preparing for the experiments accompanying some of his discourses, replying to many inquiring correspondents by letter, having considerable sickness, and in environments which have made such composition difficult, changing localities every month or two, correcting "printer's proof," have altogether employed all of his time in close work. The movement of the plant doing the typographical work into new quarters, made a further delay of several weeks. But now the publication is nearing the close. About 170 pages are in type, most of the illustrations are made, and the author hopes to have all matter in the hands of the publishers by July 5. The treatise will contain scientific data for the thinking public upon Spiritualism never before in print, and a class of data never advanced in demonstration of the philosophy of Spiritualism.

Is Man a Relative of God?

That certainly is an important question in this enlightened era of the world. Throughout all the ages of the past, God's love has been formulated and exalted to high positions in the estimation of those who had charge of governmental affairs, and to them has been attributed a controlling influence in mundane matters. If the Genesis account of creation is correct, man and women were made directly by God in accordance with a well defined plan, and in no sense can he be regarded as a parent. He stands as the architect of the first man and woman, and no more a relative to them than is the portrait the artist paints of a relative of himself. If the magnificent statue which the sculpture has chiseled from marble could be imbued with life, while it would be the creation of his brain, it could not stand in the relation of a child to a parent, hence would not from that point of view be regarded as a relative. God stands in precisely the same relation to the first pair (Adam and Eve—that is, supposing that they were created direct by him) as the sculpture does to the statue he creates, providing he has the extraordinary capacity to imbue it with life.

Enlightenment and Superstition.

Under this heading the Chicago Chronicle says:

"The persistence of superstition among peoples making the proudest boast of enlightenment receives a fresh illustration in connection with the illness of the English king.

"A London dispatch gravely states that 'the story of the king and the Epsom gypsy is being retold.' This statement implies that the story was current and familiar at one time, but the dispatch does not say when.

"It merely conveys the information that according to the story the gypsy, who was supposed to be ignorant of his majesty's identity, told him that he would 'rise high, to the throne itself, but would just fall short of his ambition at the last moment and would not be crowned king.'

"That this prophecy was uttered a good many years ago is implied by the further statement that the same 'seer' told 'the king' that even if one of his horses was going to win a race it would fall dead at the winning post, and that this prediction was fulfilled in 1886.

"Not only does this added statement imply that the story is old, but it serves to impress the superstitious mind with the belief that the coronation prophecy is likely to be fulfilled because the turf prophecy was.

"The dispatch repeats another story that some time after the Epsom 'seer' had made his prediction a palmist at Homburg foretold that the king would become ill as he started for his coronation.

"It may be that those who invent or revive these stories at this time are not themselves superstitious. It may be that they are actuated by a desire to increase the panic in stock exchange circles. If so they testify to their belief in the prevalence of superstition in those circles which are supposed to be exceptionally practical and calculating and proof against influences which fill ignorant minds with awe and alarm.

"They testify also to their belief that people will think Albert Edward was once superstitious enough himself to consult with 'seers' and palmists.

"There may be grounds for both beliefs. Every time anything happens to any very conspicuous person and every time a more than usually appalling disaster occurs just such stories become current, implying at least a popular appetite for the mysterious and superstitious.

"It is known, too, that turfmen, seamen, including officers as well as crew, and some other classes are hardly less superstitious than were our ancestors who believed in witches, ghosts, goblins and all manner of disagreeable beings who only made themselves visible or palpable occasionally.

"It has even come to light that not a few speculators, supposed to be hard-headed and profoundly skeptical as to everything outside the realm of solid fact, habitually consult astrologers and other impostors who prey upon human credulity.

"The very fact that these impostors are numerous and that under various names imported from India they are received into wealthy families and turn the heads of silly women is sufficient proof that superstition is far from being extinct.

"Perhaps our worthy preachers would render a greater service if they would discourse more of the absurdity of superstition and the barbaric ignorance which it implies and less of the imaginary glories and duties of conquest and imperial dominion. Surely, those who go forth to civilize ought not to be absurdly superstitious."

There is much of good sense in the Chronicle's remarks, but it may be added that in very many instances such predictions work out their own fulfillment. The modern explication of "suggestion" will clearly explain the manner in which the fulfillment of many so-called prophecies is wrought. Many an impressionable individual has literally been killed by utterances of mediums who have predicted, under spirit influence or not, his sickness and death. The thought, the "suggestion" lodged in the mind has actually resulted in the fulfillment of the prediction.

This being the fact, it is plain that mediums should refrain from uttering such predictions. The medium, gypsy or other, is morally responsible for death or other results thus caused.

It is enough to raise a smile on the face of the ungodly, when the Chronicle sagely suggests that the preachers would render a greater service if they would discourse more of the absurdity of superstition, etc. It seems very like calling upon a native African fetish-worshiper to declaim against superstitious observances and beliefs.

For, what class of men to-day are more saturated with superstition than the Catholic and Protestant orthodox clergy? And who do so much as they, to drive superstitious beliefs into the minds of the people? Verily, the world will have to turn to others than the preachers to save it from superstition.

The spread of general intelligence, the influence of the public secular schools, will do the work, in time; the preachers never, only in so far as they are liberated from superstition themselves.

Enlightenment is the great foe of superstition.

PRESENTIMENTS OF KING EDWARD VII.

A special cable from London, Eng., to the Chicago American, indicates that for years stories have been told by his intimates of the present King of England's extensive belief in superstition. It has been often related that among his great collection of jewels there were many Edward VII. had never worn, because he believed they were omens of evil.

In numerous other ways the King has manifested his belief in mysterious factors for good and bad luck.

But of the many prophecies of seers and clairvoyants of which he has been told, there are several that are known to have made a lasting impression upon His Majesty.

One of these was the prediction, made long before the death of Queen Victoria, that Albert Edward would live to reign as King, but would die before he had been crowned. Those who have been his closest associates say that this prediction has always caused the King much concern.

That he believed this strange prophecy would come true there can be little doubt. And at times since his accession as Great Britain's ruler his physicians have attributed several of his slight indispositions to worry, melancholy and fear that the prediction would come true.

Another incident that has been remarked upon by the King as foreboding evil is that two of the four attempts to carry off the King's crowns in days gone by were successful. And it is for that reason that no piece of regalia to be used at the coronation ceremonies is more closely guarded than the bejeweled coronet. Edward VII. has attributed the misfortune of the four rulers, from whom an attempt was made to wrench the English crown, to these attempted robberies.

Almost half a century ago an old German hermit made the prediction that early in this century there would be a great economic change in almost every civilized nation, especially England. This hermit claimed to foresee the overthrow of the present form of government, for which a republic would be substituted.

He also predicted the last ruler of England would be the best, and that is regarded as justified by the reign of Queen Victoria.

She was to be succeeded by a president, who would be a member of the royal family. The utterances by this recluse interested King Edward, then Prince of Wales, exceedingly, and he is known to have often discussed them.

Liverpool, June 24.—The Post says that a portrait of the King fell from the wall of Windsor Castle during the past week. The incident, the paper says, has caused much superstitious discussion in West End drawing-rooms.

Immortal Spirits Now.

It is a good point gained in one's spiritual life and experience, when one realizes the wonderful fact that we are immortal spirits now as much as we ever shall be. To-day and to-morrow, and through all our earth-life, we are spirits, as much as we shall be at any time in the process of future life and being beyond the veil of earthly time.

We do not have to wait for death to dissolve us of our mortal and perishable garment, before we can recognize the fact that we are spirits indeed. When these earthly bodies return "earth to earth, ashes to ashes, dust to dust" we shall remain the same spirit entities that we were before the change. Death works no change except in condition. What we are when we pass through the door, that shall we be when the door closes behind us, and we enter upon the new stage of experience.

Such is the teaching of common sense and reason; and such is the teaching of Spiritualism as given by those who have passed into the world beyond.

Such being the case, it is well to realize that by our thoughts, intents and acts, we are fashioning, day by day, the character of our spirits—the qualities of spiritual selfhood with which we shall start out on our journey after bidding adieu to our earth life.

Call Spiritualism a religion, a philosophy, a science, or a blending of them all; it calls for a true culture of those qualities that make one's immortal self rich in the things that endure and add to one's happiness and usefulness in the life that is to come.

Teaching that "whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap," and that no "blood atonement" made by another can save one from the harvest of his own sowing, Spiritualism affirms that a man must achieve his own salvation, by reformation, by making atonement if need be, and by spiritual culture and growth.

As he is here, morally and spiritually, such will he remain, until changed, as here, by upward growth and development.

Dreamed of Death.

The body of Geo. A. H. Atwood, who was killed at South Framingham, Mass., was brought back to Worcester, June 16. A strange incident in connection with his death is a story told by his wife of a dream she had Saturday night. She dreamed that she saw her husband fall from a moving train, and as he fell he called her "Margaret." She said the dream woke her up, but she paid no attention to it until she heard the story of her husband's death.

Outside the Zone of Danger.

Mrs. Emma Nickerson Warne underwent a most serious operation at Hahnemann Hospital, Chicago, on Tuesday morning, June 24. The knife confirmed all the specialists had recognized and revealed, yet other conditions not detected in the diagnosis, which were overshadowed by more superficial manifestations. She is now considered as being outside of the zone of danger and making steady strides towards recovery. As soon as prudence will allow, the monotony of the weary weeks of convalescence fronting her will be broken by taking her to the country air and quiet of Michigan farm life.

Keeping the Sabbath.

Governor Bliss, of Michigan, spent a Sunday in Washington. As he passed the White House he saw the President start for a horseback ride.

"Does the President go riding on Sunday afternoon?" ask Governor Bliss, in apparent surprise.

"Oh, yes," was the reply. "Why not?"

"It seems like desecrating the Sabbath," said the Governor.

A few minutes later the Governor met some friends.

"Where have you been to-day?" they asked.

"O," said the Governor, "I have been riding around and seeing the sights."

MAN'S STRUGGLE AGAINST EVIL

By Frederic Passy, of The Paris Institute of Moral and Political Science.

Evil has a thousand forms and envelops us on all sides. Every hour we have to defend ourselves from it. In order to trace a complete plan against it would make it necessary for us to dictate for our private as well as public conduct, for our intellectual and moral interests, and for our economic and material interests.

I do not make a pretense of promulgating this immense code and to formulate its innumerable articles. There are, however, certain essential points where useful hints may be given of errors to avoid.

It it with individual efforts that evil is to be conquered. This is a truth most profound which people are willing to recognize in theory, but which they decry in practice, as for example the voter who does not go to the polls because his voice does not signify anything and will not affect the result.

"What does it matter?" he says. "I am only a drop in the ocean!"

It matters much. The least acts of private life contribute to general morality. The person who on a public fete day prefers exercise in the open air, the gay and wholesome promenades or public lectures, popular concerts, or good dramatic presentations to the race courses, to vulgar resorts and ignoble entertainments, that man, according to the degree of his personal activity, by his preferences and aversions, gives a beneficent impulse which, multiplied by thousands of others like him, can produce a social movement fertile in happy results.

If any one wishes to better the social state he must always do it by individual effort—individual personal effort at first, collective personal effort afterward, is the only talisman for good that may be depended upon. Each man must look first to his work, and after his work to the proper employment of his product, economy, and provisions for the future.

Associated effort follows, in an association which is voluntary, which does not enfeeble the individual, which, on the contrary, fortfies him, which compels his self-respect.

It is not thus, unhappily, that most of our contemporary apostles of social regeneration labor. They usually operate with systems which have as little respect for human dignity as for justice and whose realization, if they attain a momentary success, by favoring some to the detriment of others, only cause an artificial return to inequalities.

Everybody should be guaranteed the free exercise of his faculties and the free employment of his resources. The state should have its place and should render to the individual, isolated or associated, everything to which he has a right.

It is important for us to be persuaded of the facts that social power cannot be efficacious and beneficent if individual initiative is repressed. Good deeds, on the contrary, will have attained the maximum power when individual effort has reached its highest degree of energy.

From the blood of an inert mass habituated to wait upon the power which dominates it it is difficult to extract men capable of legislating, of governing, of administrating, and of controlling. It breeds men who are apt in intrigue, in invective, in threatening, and in overturning ministries as if they were card houses. It does not bring forth serious men—men of resolution and action. We cannot make a chain of gold with links of lead.

The religious sentiment, like other sentiments of the human soul, has its errors and shortcomings. Accordingly it sometimes can be one of the forms or one of the causes of the evil against which we have to strive. It is necessary to recognize that religion only too frequently is but the deification of evil. Man incarnates his advices, his passions, his envies, his hates into a god which he imagines. But this is not the true religious spirit. To the true religious spirit we can and must appeal in combating our tendencies to evil and in establishing justice.

Against the religion of force, of discouragement, and of inertia the religion of right, founded upon a belief in something higher and more durable than passing accidents and ephemeral success, should react toward the realization of the eternal ideal. The danger lies in fatalism which accepts evil as inevitable and submits thereto.

Fatalism and the religious spirit should not be confused. Nor should fatalism be confused with resignation, which, as some one has beautifully said, is indomitable hope and indomitable energy.

The future is open before us. The human being finds himself growing indefinitely. Pleasure gives him a field of action only for the moment. Duty shows him a law which commands him without constraining him. Religion goes farther. It leads him into eternity for his own sake; for those who belong to him; for the living, for the dead; for those who have not yet been born.

HIS LAST REQUEST.

A Convicts Letter from the Gallows.

"Prisoner at the bar, stand up! You have been tried by a jury of your peers, and they have brought in their verdict. They find you guilty of murder in the first degree. I am compelled to pass sentence upon you for your rash act. The sentence is, that you be hanged by the neck until you are dead! And may God have mercy on your soul."

The prisoner never flinched or changed color, as the Judge pronounced those fatal words. He calmly swept the court room with his tired eyes. What was passing through the condemned man's mind at that moment, no one could tell. Surely he was not looking for, or expecting hope from some one in that thronged court room. If he had, none came.

A handsome man he had been; but vice and dissipation had made sad havoc with that once fine specimen of manhood. Here was one who possibly had never found the pearl within the shell; knew nothing of the wonderful force locked up within the human breast, that, cultivated and developed, spurs one on to heights of grandeur and success. The development of the soul, that knows no bounds or limits.

He passed his trembling fingers through his hair several times, then addressing the Judge, he said: "If it please Your Honor, may I say a word or two? Not in the extenuation of my crime. Not that I ask leniency at the Court's hands; you have only done your duty as a man and a Judge.

"I want to say a word to the young men I see in this court room." And he turned, facing the great throng of people who had crowded in to hear the verdict of the jury, as it had been a curious case, and had attracted more than the usual courthouse hangeron; the place was full to overflowing.

"Young men, once my prospects were as bright as yours; once my young heart bounded with joyous ambition, with boyish aspiration. Once my guileless soul knew the protecting, loving care of a Christian mother. Once my plans for the future were laid with as much sincerity and hope as yours today are being laid! And yet! you see the finish!

"Why have my hopes been blasted? Why was it my best laid plans were scattered as a frail goblet swept to the hearthstone by a careless hand? I will tell you. I was a weak swimmer in a strong current; caught in the undertow. I have battled with the wind and waves, but I have been caught in the awful vortex. Do not judge me too harshly; but see to it that you do not get in the same current.

"There is a great force in this universe, and I have discovered in part its action. Possibly it is for the best! Not that I took the life of a fellow being, but that I should feel the effects, the strength of this mighty force, that I might point the way, unfold to the eyes of the unwary and unthinking some of the pits and chasms that they will do well to avoid.

"How well do I appreciate these words, spoken by one of nature's noblemen:

'Tis better that few should die, than all
Be held in worse than deadly thrall.'

"And as I yield up to the law, my life, to pay the debt of blood, I leave in the hands of your Honored Judge this manuscript that I have written while sitting in my prison cell," and he laid on the desk a roll of closely written matter.

"This, you will find, contains great truths, bearing on this force of which I spoke. I ask Your Honor to publish through the daily press my legacy to the young men of our country. May you find there food for thought; and as you value your soul, take heed to this warning! For when you scan the contents of this roll, the hand that wrote it will be on its way—back into the laboratory of Mother Earth; and the debt will have been paid. Your Honor, I thank you for this favor! Will you, for the benefit of our young men, look through this M. S. and grant my request?"

The Judge bowed again.

"Then I am content. I thank you all, and say farewell."

Within the month the trap fell, and the law had claimed another victim. True to his word, the Judge gave to the press the man's last message to humanity. Read it. Think on it. Then judge him.

"To whom it may concern:

"When reading these lines, remember they are written solely for one purpose, and that purpose to act as a lighthouse on the sea of life, that the young and venturesome navigator may avoid the rocks and sunken reefs that rear their black heads through the flying foam and heaving swells.

"As I hope for pardon in the hereafter, as I hope for opportunity to undo the wrong I have done in my sinful earth life, for forgiveness from him whom I so grievously wronged and injured, I assert and affirm that these words are the truth, and nothing but the truth.

"My early life was spent in pleasant home surroundings; a loving mother, a fond—though often weak father. But knowing now, in a measure, the force that was brought to bear on him, I can sympathize more readily than condemn.

"At an early age I was considered a queer child. My mother used to have me sit at her side, and tell me the beautiful story of the Man of Nazareth, who died for the sins of the world, of the harp of gold, and the pearly gates of heaven. How I listened with dewy eyes and swelling heart as she pictured to me the glories of God and his kingdom, with his legions of bright-winged messengers, that came to cheer and bless mankind.

"At night, as I lay in my little white bed, after saying my evening 'Now I lay me,' I would sometimes feel a hand laid upon my head. 'Surely an angel!' I would say; but instinctively covered my head and lay in fear and trembling. Often my covers would be snatched rudely from my bed, leaving me shivering with fright and cold. Then I would cry out! My mother would come and rearrange my bed and attempt to soothe me, by telling me I was dreaming, and flighty. When I would tell her I felt hands on my head, she would say 'Hush! Do not speak of this any more. There is no one near you! Be a good boy, and God and the angels will watch over you. Now go to sleep and do not worry mamma with such imaginations!' Oh! how I smothered in my little breast all of the awful mystery that surrounded me.

"At times I would see horrid dark faces leering at me from all sides. Hear fierce whispers and demoniacal laughter that would freeze my very blood. When I would attempt to speak of it to my mother, she would warn me to stop, or some restraining hand would hold me, and a harsh voice command me to desist. Oh, my God! how I prayed for the gentle loving Jesus, the Angels of light with glittering wings. Why, oh, why did they not come? Surely I needed their help.

"What had I done that I should suffer such torment? In the dark hours of the night when all others could sleep and rest, why should I be tormented and frightened? With streaming eyes and choking voice I called for help, but no help came. Sometimes I would see a bright face, but it would immediately be surrounded in gloom. Occasionally a bright form would show itself for an instant, but always vanished, leaving me in darkness more intense. I realized I must bear my burden alone, no matter how heavy. For months I would have peace; my eyes would not be tortured by sights, or my ears by the sounds of those awful visitors. Then again they would break in on me, nearly driving me wild with fright.

"Thus matters went on, until I was quite a growing lad. As I grew older, and began to mingle with the world, with redoubled fury did these dark demons hurl themselves at me. I was pulled here and there! Pushed with superhuman force into places and deeds at which my soul revolted with horror. The tempters pleaded, raved and cursed. They made promises of worldly remuneration. Vowed vengeance against me, and mine, unless I complied with their request.

"And what was that, you ask?

"That I give up my life to the gratification of their maddened consuming passions. That I put myself in their hands as an instrument whereby they could come in rapport with the things their burning, thirsty, damnable souls craved most.

"They were legions! I alone! No God! No Jesus! No Angels to reclaim my sinking feet! I fell! I lived not one life but many, seldom my own! Like a derelict craft on the angry waters I was tossed hither and thither; no captain, no pilot, no compass, only a hellish crew of mutineers! Is it any wonder I wrecked?

"Pity? I did not ask for pity! Help was what I needed, what I prayed for; but help never came. I was simply a slave—an unwilling slave to—what?

"You will say devils. Yes, call them devils, if you will. But they were made devils while they were inhabitants of the clay! As I am; as you are. Demons? Yes! Heartless, selfish, inhuman, wretched beings. Once they were babes—boys—youths—now? Oh God, how horrible to contemplate! Human souls so lost to sin and animalism! Vice of every kind. With only one thought in their never-ending miserable existence. That thought—gratification! Oh! the shame of it. The curse of it.

"Men—Brothers! You who are now passing through the valley of shadows, now is the time to make or mar your lives. Listen to my voice as one gone beyond, warning you not to pass this by lightly; this is God's truth that I am leaving to you. Have I not suffered? Have I not faced the awful storms of earth life, blown about as a thistle down in a gale? Why should I have suffered the pangs of this awful Hell. Were it not that I should travel the grewsome road, stumbling, fainting, falling, to tell the dreadful perils of the way? To tell the truth to men? Men have suffered through all the long dark night of the journey up from the depths. Suffered, not knowing the cause. Here is the cause: Man is surrounded by the thought world as completely as he is surrounded by air. He knows not where his thought ends or others begins.

"What? You think all is forgotten, lost, that preceded our short life? Not so! Every thought that has been projected in the great sea of ether is yet a thing! Oh how true! They go out, either tipped with hate, that poisons wherever it strikes, or freighted with love to sooth some weary soul.

"Brothers, I know whereof I speak. I have drained the bitter cup to the dregs. But it remains for you to teach humanity the truth and the light. My dear brother! this is not the all of life; 'tis but the beginning. Man is an immortal being. Shall we have him leave his earth home an Angel or a Demon? Think of the misery! Think of the remorse! Of the awful craving for the passions and appetites of a degraded earth life. These sin-scarred souls must be redeemed! They must be raised to a higher life.

"I pray you, my brothers, now that you know the truth, so live and teach, that men will not leave the earth for depths of gloom with ruffian souls; but leave it knowing the truth, with grander aspirations, with souls broadened by liberality, tempered by love. Oh, how I have prayed these hungry souls to leave me; to seek that which satisfies the soul, that carries one higher. But I must carry the unwilling burden to the end.

"They crush me down; then curse me for being weak. But thank God! my stumbling feet are nearing the end. The door must open soon, to shelter a weary, footsore traveler. Peace I will not have! But, thank heaven, my own sins will be my only load. My tormenters then can only leave me, to perhaps seek out another victim, which I pray God they may never find.

"My brothers, learn the truth! This truth will make you free. Fear nothing but the result of evil doing. If bitter tears, and drops of agony wrenched from my tortured soul through my unhappy career, will be aught to you; if by taking advantage of my experiences some of my brothers can escape the snares set by these hungry souls, these cunning, crafty, thirsty wretches of human kind, I am content.

"Know, then, that surrounding you are the immortal souls of men; snow white hands reach down from higher spheres to help you up the rugged road of life and light. Dark trembling hands, a legion, feel around to clasp you in their gruesome clutch.

"I have done my part, my brothers. Now do yours. Remember! this is not the end.

"May your efforts to raise both spirit and mortal souls to a higher plane of life be rewarded as ye truly deserve, is the prayer of one who also needs your help.

"The candle is nearly out.
"My work is finished."

AN INDIAN SERENADE.

I arise from dreams of thee
In the first sweet sleep of night,
When the winds are breathing low
And the stars are shining bright.
I arise from dreams of thee,
And a spirit in my feet
Hath led me—who knows how?
To thy chamber window, Sweet!

The wandering airs they faint
In the dark, the silent stream—
And the Champak's odors pine
Like sweet thoughts in a dream;
The nightingale's complaint
It dies upon her heart,
As I must die on thine,
O, beloved as thou art!

O, lift me from the grass!
I die! I faint! I fail!
Let thy love in kisses rain
On my lips and eyelids pale.
My cheek is cold and white, alas!
My heart beats loud and fast;
O, press it to thine own again,
Where it will break at last!

MY EXPERIENCES WITH W. W. ABER.

As Related by J. H. Pratt, of Spring Hill, Kansas.

SOME REMARKABLE STATEMENTS ILLUSTRATING THE POWER OF SPIRITS—STRANGE APPEARANCE OF TWO WHITE DOVES UNDER PECULIAR CIRCUMSTANCES.

Since my last letter to you, there is a picture of Gracie Soulard and her father on the north wall of the kitchen. Her picture is full of laughter, and is as plain and distinct as many of the photographs. Her father is not so plain, though plainer day by day.

I was going in the spring of 1859 to Valparaiso, Chili. I took the steamer to New Orleans for Havana about the 8th of May. The day we left New Orleans was robed in splendor. My mind went back to my home—to my little ones—when, bright and clear, came two children, six and eight years old. They were Bertha and Gracie Soulard, with their mother and uncle, Mr. John DeLand, from Macon, Georgia, destined to San Francisco to meet their father. Our friendship ripened in the six days we were together. When we parted at Panama it was the parting of old friends.

Nearly thirty years had intervened when I hired Wm. W. Aber to come to my house and hold materializing seances. It was the eighth seance before I recognized a soul. At that seance I recognized three persons, clear and distinct, with the same verity as if I had met them in physical life. The first time I was called up to the aperture, I saw Captain Jacob Hurd, who built and owned the Effie Afton, which was lost, and his life, on the rapids of the Mississipi between Rock Island, Ill., and Davenport, Iowa. Sometime in the sixties he was profound and deliberative. He was ardent in his friendship and in the right, and lofty in his bearing. We were of equal weight and size. He was a marked blonde, and his beard fell to his waist. His habit was often to handle his beard entreatingly when a subject was being handled from its profoundest researches. Such was Captain Jacob Hurd that I first saw after his wreck on the evening of the first of October, 1888. Charles R. Bell also materialized as shown in his picture in "Rending the Vail," in 1898, on page 208. He was in my employ herding cattle in 1872-3.

After I saw them to my deliberative study, I was ordered to my seat. After I had sat there a moment, I was called up again to the aperture, when my eyes fell on Mary Bradford Morton, with her hair disheveled, putting it to rights before the glass. Mary was good, though she lacked firmness. I married her sister after Mary was three years old. Her parents being old and poor I adopted her, clothed and educated her well by sending her to a female college. At the age of sixteen, I left her with her parents in Kentucky. After I left her she regularly corresponded with me until her death. She wrote that she was called to Hezekiah Morton's on a visit, by Elleanor Morton. Mary and Elleanor Morton were cousins, and nearly of the same age, about seventeen. The family had owned a large estate of negroes, and had run their course. They were left with a vast fund of superstition. They lived on a large farm, in a two-story brick house. Elleanor was imbued with this superstition: It was to light a candle in a room and sit until eleven o'clock without disturbance, when the image of the girl's husband would appear. The first night they sat the appearance was so ludicrous that Mary exploded with laughter. Not so with Elleanor. Mary's conduct moved her to tears. This sobered Mary to silence when they sat again. They sat a few evenings afterwards in sobriety until near eleven o'clock; then there appeared two white doves that flew around and around Elleanor's head. She exclaimed: "I am not going to get married at all. I am going to die, to die." Mary told it to nearly everyone.

Her visit expired and she returned home. In less than three weeks a message came that Elleanor was very sick. She went and found her cousin dangerously ill. She nursed her for sixteen days when she died. The doctor was there when she expired. (I knew him well, but cannot think of his name. I bought tons of lime of him.) The father and mother were old, and Elleanor had been sick a long while. They had laid down to rest. Mary continued to take charge of her for the night. The doctor made two visits that night. As her breath left her those white messengers came again.

"See, doctor, are those bats?" said Mary.

"No, they are white doves," replied the doctor. "How did they get in here?"

They flew around and around the death chamber until they were weary of their presence. The doctor finally said, "Let them out." When they raised the windows and they were apparently gone. Shortly after she had occasion to go down stairs to the kitchen, when lo! there those birds appeared again. They came with her to death's chamber and the doctor.

One more episode I will relate because it is true. When I lived on the farm, I worked hard and retired early. I often did my best thinking in bed. I often sent messages late at night, some a thousand miles away to Mary. She would always respond. Often when she retired she got up from her bed to write a letter to me. She would commence the letter by remarking that she had gone to bed, but not to sleep; something she left unfinished; it was a letter to me. She composed it and went to sleep. This experiment I often practiced.

Mary's picture has come on the north door of the kitchen by spirit power. The picture shows all the graces and lineaments of her face. Samuel Smidt, Mr. Aber's control, who talked half an hour after each materializing seance (his talk was a part of the seance), announced that Bertha was here, and she is for you, Mr. Pratt. I could not think of her. "Well, you must think."

I hired Mr. Aber in 1888 for six months, with nine seances a week. Bertha was persistent. She, by her recent death, had rolled away the debris of thirty years. I was full of business. I had not time to give her attention; but she was persistent. At each seance, Sam was busy with her name. Finally I told him I could not recall her unless she gave some prominent clew to our acquaintance. She said: "Don't you recollect two little girls you met on the steamer on the Gulf of Mexico. I am their mother. I and Gracie are here." The clouds were dispersed from my memory. They materialized again and again. I learned them as well as if I had them in the same house with me, normally in the physical state.

I have slate writings from the two, innumerable. The handwriting was different in each. I have from Gracie Soulard thirty handwritings, all similar. They run through a course of twelve years, and they are the same writings.

One day I was quite clairvoyant and clairaudient in the winter of 1888, and two colored persons appeared to me to talk, male and female. The female was forward and did the talking. She was as black as a coal. The scales of her skin lay close, and on her head was a white turban. The man, who stood behind her, was in color of a lighter hue. The scales stood up from his skin, leaving it husky. Tall, thin and bony was he; his hat was to his knee. She did the talking. She said they were body servants to Mrs. Bertha Soulard; that her name was Susan; that her old man was John. Much conversation followed that is not necessary to mention. On that evening Grace Soulard materialized. I asked her: "Have I seen anything to-day more than usual?"

"Yes, you have seen Sudy and John."

"No, my lady, you are mistaken in the name of the woman she gave me."

"Yes, you saw Sudy and John. They were colored people, and told you they were mamma's body servants."

"That is true, excepting the name of the woman. She told me her name was Susan, not Sudy."

"Well, her name was Susan, but we called her Sudy for short."

On July 15, 1890, was the first my typewriter was used in total darkness. Everything was so guarded against deception and fraud as to make it as apparent as day. The marble top stand on which the writing was done was before me. My legs were thrust beneath the north end, and I know the medium did not move from the seat in the middle of the room. I saw the luminous form who handled the typewriter.

Formation of the two was variant. She wrote: "Dear Papa—You did not think that I could write with the typewriter, did you? Gracie."

Below was stamped a perfect star in deep blue, and still below this was the picture of a little girl of eight, perhaps, with head and upturned features, golden hair tied behind, the waist white, and the skirt of deep blue; her right arm on her back, and below this picture, in a delicate lady handwriting in red, the following message: "Dear Papa—This is the way I looked when you saw me on shipboard with mamma. Gracie."

Another picture of Gracie Soulard I had shortly afterwards, more natural in appearance, and another on the wall of the kitchen in June, 1898, not farther than thirty inches, though higher on the wall. When Gracie and her father came out, there was a number appeared, some of life size. They are subjects of the public.

I will state here that the wall of the kitchen was papered and oiled some years ago. I have employed Mr. Aber twelve years in sections. I will write up what is dear to my mind. Some things are weird and uncanny. For instance, Gracie brought two parcels of hair one night in the summer of 1890, and dropped them in my lap. She brought them from her uncle, John DeLand, from Santa Cruz, Cal. She said: "I have some painting that I did before night in the tablet." J. H. PRATT.

SPIRITUALISM.

"Why Not Call It a Religion?"

The article under the above caption by Eld. H. W. B. Myrick, and published in No. 657 of The Progressive Thinker, has attracted my attention, and I can agree with some of his statements and conclusions. I have no objection whatever to calling Spiritualism a religion if any one chooses to do so, as it all depends upon our definition of the word and what it means to the individual.

I do not, however, nor will many Spiritualists agree with him when he makes the statement that Spiritualism has added no new nor valuable concept concerning the spiritual expression of life. Spiritualism certainly did introduce the idea that immortality or continued life beyond the grave does not depend upon a belief in creeds or bibles, nor in the Gods and Saviors of Christianity. It is based on none of these, but is based upon the eternal principles of Nature, and declares that life beyond the change called death is our natural inheritance regardless of the teachings of the past.

Bro. Myrick says: "Millions of people believe that in the future life there is a God, a Son of that God," etc. That this is a concept of Christianity no one will deny, but it is by no means the concept of Spiritualism. The universal testimony of spirits is to the effect that they know no more of God nor any special Son of God than they did in mortal life.

Again, "neither did Spiritualism introduce into the world the idea that a pure, good, just life here in this world is necessary to the happiness of the spirit over there." Now this is precisely what Spiritualism did do, and makes our status over there entirely dependent upon the life lived and deeds done by the individual, instead of depending upon the atoning blood of a sacrificed savior, which is a cardinal doctrine in the Christian scheme of salvation. From my earliest recollection I have heard the doctrine preached that we are hell-deserving wretches, made so by the sins of our first parents, that nothing we can do, no matter how well our lives are ordered, can change our status, and no matter how unworthy our lives may be, "Jesus died and paid it all, all the debt I owe," and "while the lamp holds out to burn, the vilest sinner may return." Even the red-handed murderer has by this provision of Christian teachings been able to swing from the scaffold straight into glory and the company of the redeemed. Thousands have taken advantage of the provisions of Christianity to lead careless and wicked lives, hoping to escape by a death-bed repentance, and other thousands are doing the same to-day.

Christianity has divided the realm of spirit into only two divisions, heaven and hell, with no intermediate state between. All the teeming hosts of humanity are classed as belonging to either the sheep or the goats, the sheep to ascend to the right hand of God, there to dwell in supreme felicity, not for any good they have done but because they were believers in the dogmas of Christianity. The state of the poor goats is irrevocably fixed, and they must forever remain the victims of eternal despair. No provision is made whereby they may retrieve their sad mistakes and by earnest effort outgrow past conditions and rise to a higher and brighter life.

It was left for Spiritualism to demonstrate that conditions on the invisible side of life are strictly natural conditions; that we are under the dominion of law, there as here, and that in that expression of life there is not only every opportunity for advancement which we have here, but in many cases the opportunity is better by reason of better environment. This is the universal testimony of spiritual intelligences since the first dawn of Modern Spiritualism, and could Bro. Myrick have the opportunity to more fully investigate the phenomena and listen to the teachings of these dwellers in invisible realms, he would be able to change his "I believe" to "I know," and would never again make the mistake of affirming that Spiritualism has offered no new concept concerning life beyond the change called death.

On His Seventy-third Birthday.

On June 17 about thirty friends of Mr. Samuel Smith gathered at the home of his son, Edgar P. Smith, 207 North Prospect street, the occasion being his seventy-third birthday. This was his first birthday party. He invited the writer to come and preach his funeral sermon; he wished to hear it himself, and I complied with his request.

Mr. Smith is a veteran in the cause of Spiritualism, a fine psychic. He did a great deal of pioneer work in this State and Illinois, traveling through the country with horse and buggy, lecturing and holding circles in homes and schoolhouses. Many have been brought into the knowledge of the immortality of the soul through his mediumship. We could say, did space permit, many beautiful things concerning his life work.

On this anniversary of his birth, his friends came laden with flowers, tokens of their love and esteem. After the address, Mrs. O. S. Orane read an article she had written under inspiration, which was appropriate and instructive. Mrs. Mina Hanley gave an impromptu poem on Mr. Smith's life. Miss Pearl Smith sang a number of sweet songs and solos. She was obliged to answer to many encores. A pleasing feature of the evening was instrumental music by three children, Miss Marguarite Van Ness, Masters Beryl Hudson and Eddy Andrews, on piano, violin and mandolin. These young people are artists in their line. Refreshments were served.

Thus the evening was spent. On leaving all expressed themselves as having had a good time and wished Mr. Smith many happy returns of the day. Mr. and Mrs. Edgar Smith are excellent entertainers and gave all a hearty welcome to their home.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM.

It Embraces Whatever Is Worthy in Every System.

NUMBER SEVEN.

The Bible.

The unanswerable argument of an old man among the illiterate was, "Didn't I see it in print?" That was before the advent of the higher criticism. In that day also the religious man silenced opposition with the assertion that it was in the Bible. That day has gone by, although in the minds of many it still has great presumptive weight. The story is told of a preacher who, reading about the marriage of Noah, inadvertently turned two leaves and read: "Now Noah took unto himself a wife three hundred cubits long," etc., and said it might seem strange but undoubtedly it was true and illustrated the peculiar nature of woman, etc. This spirit of dumb concession militates against finding the truth in the Bible or any other book.

A negro convert used to carry a Bible and would accost strangers with the question, "Any of you gem-men want to 'spute about de holy scriptures?" Now I am not anxious to "'spute" about it. Reading critically and exercising a free judgment I confess to great help from it, but the sophist may as well spend his time moistening a duck's back as in trying to obscure some inconsistencies and contradictions or reconcile some inharmonies of this conglomeration of ancient opinion and mediumistic expression.

The great prophets foretold a bright time coming when "Saith the Lord I will make a new covenant with my people. I will put my laws in their minds, and in their hearts will I write them." This was the old prophetic way of announcing the evolution of a people who would acknowledge that the divine laws have always been inscribed in the minds and hearts and who would esteem any book according to its help in deciphering and revealing those laws of a true psychology—laws voiced in natural desire, a recognition of which results in love and joy and peace. The Bible with its ring of "sad sincerity" lays bare the secret places of the human heart—sounds the depths and shallows of our nature in a brave and simple way, and this is the secret of its power to sway the mind. But it is not even in the narrowest sense the only "word of God." The ethics, dogmas, ceremonies, of our Bible have their counterpart in other scriptures. "Other sheep have I which are not of this fold."

Again, the "word of God" is progressive and we should avoid "making it of none effect with our traditions"—they being none the less traditions for being printed, and the word, the "logos" of Modern Spiritualism conflicts with some biblical dogmas and cannot be reconciled with it "holus bolus," any more than modern physical science.

NUMBER EIGHT.

God; or The Gods.

The prophecy referred to in the preceding article, continuing says, "and they shall not teach every man his brother saying know the Lord." Well that is the distinctive trait of the Modern Spiritualist. Our revelation on the subject is simply this, that spirits find over there no more than they did here a personality acknowledged as God Almighty, and the "God who is not far from any one of you," and who "dwells within you all," is the one to be reckoned with in every realm. Some people fear that abandoning the personal God for the principle divine tends to unrestrained vice, to make one reckless and an outlaw. There is proof positive to the contrary in thousands who live just as simple lovable lives as do any who worship a personal God. But to be liberal, if one must worship a personal God and not discern that really they seize the picture, look at the shadow and not the reality, Spiritualism only insists that they worship a being as generous and compassionate and lovable as some notable agnostics.

If the Christian in saying "God is Love" had let it go at that, instead of telling us in the next breath that he is vengeance, implacable hatred, unnatural cruelty, it had been well. The Bible which gives the views of various ancient ones says Adam talked with God as did Cain and tried to deceive him. Abraham heard him speak. Moses "talked with God face to face," at one time, as did also another prophet. Yet again we are told no man could look on God and live, and this same Moses could only endure his glance at his back from the cleft in a rock. Jesus said, "He that hath seen me hath seen the father," yet almost the last in scripture on the subject is "no man hath seen God at any time."

Logically we may say an omnipresent influence has never been localized and personified, and so long as the smallest child has a will, an individuality, no other is omnipotent on earth or in the skies. Again, if I exist I am a part of the infinite, and no other is infinite nor is there an "Infinite Intelligence" separate from my intelligence.

A negro to-day in ecstatic moments becomes mediumistic and sees or hears God, and in scripture the context will show that the personal God was the "control" of the medium, and "thus saith the Lord" was equivalent to thus saith my guide or control; and the "word of God" was what the sensitive had from the spirit world in any of the various ways from "writing on tablets of stone" (slate-writing) to lucid clairaudience.

While recognizing the personal God ancient and modern alike in his most aspirational moments reached out after the impersonal God—the divine principle that blesses life, refines and ennobles humanity.

The word spirit is used in two senses—as a personality or an abstraction, as in reference to the spirit of John Smith or as we say "spirit of beauty." When Jesus said "God is spirit," it is not a bold assumption to say he probably meant an abstraction, and so it is well in saying God is Love to remember the counter proposition, Love is God. "He that loveth most the same is greatest in the Kingdom of Heaven.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

An Inquiring Spiritualist writes: "Is Spiritualism an adjunct or offshoot of Catholicism? I notice in a late number of The Progressive Thinker that the pastor of one of the Chicago societies administers the rite of baptism and confirmation, and I am led to ask if these are considered saving ordinances among Spiritualists? The fact that flowers are used instead of water makes it none the less a church ordinance, while the argument used in some quarters as justification, that 'it is a means to an end,' is simply a restatement in another form of the old Jesuit doctrine that the end justifies the means. Not seeing the date for holy communion, I presume it was inadvertently left off the program."

Harry J. Moore writes: "I will be at Jenison Park Camp, July 4. Mrs. Cooley and I will have charge of the services that day. Mrs. Cooley lectures in the afternoon at 2:30 and I in the morning at 10:30, and also in the evening at 7:30. Moses Hull cannot be there on the 4th, so I will fill his place—if such a thing were possible."

The Evening Standard of New Bedford, Mass., has the following: "The long-drawn-out suit of William F. Nye and other minority stockholders in the Onset Bay Grove Association against John Q. A. Whittemore and others, a majority of the said corporation, is nearing its end, but will not be concluded much before the lease, which forms the basis of action, expires by limitation, some time in July. The last stages in the case, the submission of arguments by briefs, are now being taken before Hon. A. M. Alger, the master who heard the evidence. The brief of the plaintiff has been submitted by L. LeB. Holmes and A. B. Collins, counsel for Mr. Nye, and it is expected that Judge Grover, counsel for respondent, will file his within a few days." Onset seems to be badly out of joint.

A Robertson writes from Watseka, Ill.: "The cause is progressing slowly but steadily here, more by individual effort than otherwise, and there are many who, while saying but little, are thinking deeply."

Correspondent writes: "The Band of Harmony of Clinton, Iowa, met at Mt. Pleasant Park Sunday afternoon. Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley spoke on the subject under discussion, 'Woman and Her Influence Over Man.' Every word had its weight as they fell from the lips of our earnest sister. They impressed her hearers with the plea for more love and less lust, saying woman's power of man was great indeed. If her intention and thought were pure she could lift him up to the very highest ideal life; if impure, however, it seems she could drag him down. All present concluded that if Mrs. Cooley's plans of teaching were followed a better generation would be the result. After the service a bountiful repast was served and general happiness prevailed. In the evening friends gathered at the residence of Miss Foster, where the same generous spirit of welcome was manifested. We are all heartily glad to have our Sister Cooley with us again. Her stay is too short, alas! as she leaves this week to begin her camp work in Michigan."

Prof. H. A. Streight, whose wonderful paintings have astonished the world during the past forty years, has been spending a few days in San Francisco with his old-time friend, Henry Harrison Brown. The Professor is now making his home in Mountain View, Cal. He brought with him to the city several grand paintings, among them one of the Ruddy Sunset as seen from the Farralone Islands, which for blending of colors and magical effect would be very difficult to rival. He paints these pictures while under heavy inspiration.—Philosophical Journal.

Prof. P. O. Hudson, of Bay City, Mich., writes: "I will conduct the orchestra and the singing at Island Lake Camp this season. Persons coming who can sing, bring along your music; also bring along the Spiritualist Hymnal, and join the choir. Miss Daisy Dargis will be the pianist. Mr. T. A. Davenport will be the balladist, and clarionetist. Mr. Bliss, of Lansing, Mich., will also do cornet solos, and render vocal selections."

Virginie Barrett writes: "I wish to inform my friends and those desiring my services as speaker, that I have moved from the old number, and can now be addressed in the future at 1015 Broadway, Indianapolis, Ind. I will make special efforts with those societies in need of help and a leader."

The Paw Paw Valley Spiritual Association will hold a grove meeting at Lake Cora, Van Buren county, Mich., Sunday, July 6. Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y., will lecture at 11 a. m. and 2 p. m. There are expected to be good test mediums and those for other phases of spirit manifestation on the grounds. Minnie Reed Marvin, an accomplished musician from Lansing, Mich., will furnish music. The usual gate fee will be collected of those coming by teams or by train. Everybody invited to come and enjoy the day in the grove and on the lake. Many improvements have been made at this resort. It is a beautiful spot, with first-class accommodations for all. Mrs. S. Hunter, Secretary.

A meeting was held on Sunday, June 15, 1902, in Woodmen Hall, Oakland, Cal., to protest against an amended ordinance prepared by the city council of Oakland, containing a provision imposing a license tax upon Spiritualist mediums, and others demonstrating spiritual phenomena, and practicing occult science, charging fees for so doing.

Mrs. Dr. Edwards, of Chicago, will hold services Sunday evenings during the month of July, at Woodman Hall, Capitol avenue and 16th street, Omaha, Neb. Lecture, tests and independent slate writing at 7:30 p. m. Reading, slate and letter writing daily at parlors, 111 South 17th street.

The answer of the vatican to the proposals of the United States in the matter of the friars' lands has been presented to Governor Taft, who is said to be disappointed in its contents. The answer takes emphatic exception to the policy of the administration at Washington. Governor Taft will communicate its text at once to the secretary of state. Rome is defiant.

The First West Side German Spiritualist Society will give its thirteenth grand picnic, Sunday, July 6, at Reisig Grove. Take Metropolitan to 48th street, and then take LaGrange electric car to grove. Tickets 25 cents. English and German speaking. All are welcome.

Dr. R. McL. Angus writes from Toledo, Ohio: "Mrs. Nellie Harmes, inspirational lecturer and test medium, held her first public meeting, June 22, in Memorial Hall. The lecture was uplifting and to the point. Her subject was 'Hell in the Spirit World,' and it was handled beautifully. Mrs. Harmes will continue to hold Sunday evening meetings in the hall mentioned."

Rebecca Still writes: "I would be very sorry to be deprived of The Progressive Thinker, there is so much information in the paper that I could not get elsewhere, and when the Religion of Man is received I shall have all your premium books. Words are not strong enough to express my thankfullness to you for the information received from the studying of them."

Frank T. Ripley will serve the West Side Spiritualist Church, Columbus, O., for the three Sundays of July, then he goes to Summerland Beach camp-meeting. He will be there from July 27 to August 17; from August 17 to Sept 7 he will be at the Ashley camp-meeting. He is now making up his fall and winter engagements. He can be addressed at 48 West Rich street, Columbus, Ohio.

Mrs. Alice Baker, lecturer and message Medium, writes: "Being called to Cincinnati to look after some business matters, I soon found myself busily engaged in spiritual work. Cincinnati spiritually is in a very low condition, having no organized society. We found reasons (legion) why this state of affairs exists. When some of the good people knew I was in the city, they secured a hall and at once arranged to hold some meetings. I lectured and gave messages to good and appreciative audiences. The old Union Society is now laying plans to reorganize in the fall, and we hope to soon see Cincinnati at work again in administering spiritual food and demonstrating the fact of the continuity of man to the masses. I am now at home, and will answer calls for funerals and make engagements with societies for fall work. Home address, 261 Pearl street, Cleveland O."

H. Nettleton writes: "I enjoy The Progressive Thinker very much. There is much in it I do not comprehend, but there is enough to interest me. I enjoy William Denton's abrupt and brusque messages. My wife, who died three years ago, said when nearing her passing out, 'I'm coming back.' Could I realize it as some say they do, I should enjoy it."

Mrs. J. E. Staner writes: "The Spiritual Research closed its meetings on June 25 for the summer. Will give notice of re-opening through The Progressive Thinker.

Dr. T. A. Bland informs us that he is open to engagements at a few of the western spiritual camps, for one or two lectures, on very liberal terms. Dr. Bland, though a western man by birth, is far better known in the east, especially as a public lecturer than he is in the west. As an author, however, he is known throughout the whole country. He is a veteran Spiritualist, and the management of any of the camps would do well to engage him especially for his lecture entitled, "The Religion of Demonstration Versus the Religion of dogma." This lecture was first given at Onset, some years ago, and elicited high praise. He can be addressed at 101 Hoyne avenue, Chicago.

Secretary writes: "The Englewood Spiritual Union, Chicago, held an ice cream social in their hall, on Friday evening, June 20. We had an excellent literary and musical programme. Sunday evening, June 22, we had a fine lecture by Harry Moore, although disappointed by Mrs. Maggie Waite. Her place was well filled by Mrs. Gehring, who gave spirit messages, also independent slate-writing. Mrs. Albright, of Philadelphia was also present, and gave a number of tests. Dr. Freedman sang a song entitled 'Angel Footsteps on the Floor,' and Mrs. Harry Moore sang one of Longley's beautiful songs. Altogether we had a very enjoyable evening, and a large audience. Harry Moore will be with us the first two Sundays in July; after that the society adjourns till the first Sunday in October. We will hold our annual picnic on July 4, in Jackson Park, just north of the German Government Building. All are invited. We will have a yellow and white flag, with the American flag in one corner, so anyone can find us in that way.

D. V. Emmons writes: "Mrs. Marian Carpenter, of Detroit, and Mrs. A. E. Sheets, of Grand Ledge, held a grove meeting at Follet's Grove, near Belleview, Mich., June 22. Fully one thousand people listened to the words of inspiration that flowed from the lips of Mrs. Carpenter in the forenoon, and Mrs. Sheets in the afternoon. Mrs. Carpenter was the message bearer, feasting many hungry souls with messages from loved ones, the writer being remembered by words of comfort from a wife and seven children on the spirit side. The day was one to be long remembered by all present."

The Rev. John L. Scudder, pastor of the First Congregational church, Jersey City, delivered a sermon treating of "Obstacles to Church Attendance."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

He said: "The most serious obstacle to the church is the attitude of the laboring classes. The church of the future must fight oppression and develop with all its power the brotherhood of man. The church services must be made so interesting that people cannot afford to miss them. The sermon must be as pungent and sparkling as the newspapers. Pious platitudes must go out of window. The clergy will have to eat more ginger and wake up earlier in the morning. The church must give as good music as the Sunday concert, and spiritual inspiration must be conveyed in more pleasing forms than now. Another cause of non-attendance is to be found within the church itself, in its intellectual narrowness, its illiberal temper, its unwillingness to accept new truths, and its disposition to cling to antiquated forms of doctrine." The Rev. Mr. Scudder declared last week for women angels who were of athletic turn or weighed 200 pounds.

A. W. Keller secretary, writes: "Sunday, June 22, was a great day for the Englewood Spiritual Union. Harry J. Moore's eloquent lecture on the 'Fall of Man from the State of Perfection or Evolution—Which?' was followed by Mrs. Gehring in messages and slate-writing. Her messages were perfect and her public slate-writing remarkable under test conditions. She used an ordinary book-slate consisting of six pages which were all filled with writing—in three different colors, white red and gold; the latter color was extracted from a gold watch requested by one of her guides, to be taken from a watch from somebody in the audience, which was granted. Our meetings are always well attended. Sunday, June 29, Mr. Moore will lecture on the 'Woman of Endor as an Ideal Character and Medium.' A spiritual christening and confirmation service will follow the lecture. Flowers will be used instead of water. Spirit messages will accompany the services."

The Church of the Soul, the only Spiritualist church in the world, will have a woman pastor. Mrs. Millie Renouf Palmer, who has studied Spiritualism for fifteen years, and who has been a lecturer for the same length of time, will occupy the pulpit of the new church, which will be opened in about three months. Mrs. Palmer lives at 1208 Master street. She said yesterday that the form of worship in the Church of the Soul will be the same as that in the Unitarian church. Unitarian hymnals will be used. Continuing, she said: "A church such as we have asked a charter for seems to be the need of the hour. There are hundreds of earnest Spiritualists who seek a church where God may be worshiped. There are many false Spiritualists who prey on gullible people. At least half of the so-called spirit communications are not genuine. I have seen many people humbugged by men and women who swindle in the name of Spiritualism. It is not everyone who has the gift of clairvoyance. I possess it. I had the gift of second sight long before I knew what it was. We have not chosen a site for our church. Several wealthy men are talking of buying a place where we may meet. Our converts are from all other denominations."—Philadelphia American.

S. Hartman writes: "In relation to the late article by W. C. Hodge, I would just remark, that, perhaps, had we a knowledge of the fact that the Genesis account of all that relates to the children of Israel was written by a prejudiced Egyptian, and was then put on record in the King's library, we could more easily believe the essential parts of the Old Testament if we had been truly informed; but everything had to be done by and under the authority of the then reigning king or emperor, so it was impossible for the truth to reach us from those ancient days of human history. Enough is known, however, to show that the Jews were badly persecuted by all other religious devotees. I think that Dr. J. B. Newbrough's new Bible sheds a flood of light on the Bible of the Jews, as well as all other people in the history of the earth."

Mattie W. Howard writes from Bay City, Mich.: "We are in receipt of the book, 'A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands,' and thank you for your promptness in sending it and in renewing our subscription to The Progressive Thinker. We have been subscribers for several years to The Progressive Thinker, and find it always deserving of its name. Every number is full of expressions of progressive thought. We appreciate it fully. We have at different times purchased several of your premium books, and consider them a valuable addition to our home library. I wish prosperity and an increasingly large circulation to your paper."

Jennie Jacques writes from San Francisco, Cal.: "Well, let the good work go on, and long may you be spared to publish the glad tidings to all heart-weary and desponding souls."

James Kent writes: "The article in a previous issue of The Progressive Thinker, speaking of the good work done by the Salvation Army in the slums, was timely and I hope all Spiritualists will emulate their example thus far; no matter what our belief, let us cherish one thing—all things else pass them by; creeds and dogmas all must perish, but truth alone can never die. There is but one religion, 'No God.' Let Spiritualists show their light by their examples, illustrating to the world the grandeur and beauty of their knowledge. Let the strong aid the weak, physically, mentally and spiritually. Our motives prompt our acts. We are judged by them. Let them be pure, and our reward is certain. Unless Spiritualists live up to their highest light, they are no better than the creed-bound. Spiritualism, which is making rapid strides externally, is watched keenly by all sects, and unless Spiritualists cultivate and live the highest spirituality, their profession and material idols will be shaken to their foundation. If we have nothing else to do but talk of those that sin, it is better to commence at home, and from that point begin. I will tell them of a better plan, and I find it works well: To try my own defects to cure ere others' faults I tell, and though I sometimes hope to be no worse than some I know, my own shortcomings bid me let the faults of others go."

Mrs. Ann Johnson writes from Allegheny, Pa.: "Our city has been highly favored with the presence of Mrs. Nellie S. Bande, of Detroit, Mich., who has created a great interest here, her audience steadily increasing. It was a beautiful sight last Sunday to see so many earnest souls crowd around her to express their gratitude and high appreciation of her spiritual work. No subject seems too difficult for her guides to handle. She carries her audience with her to the loftiest plane of thought. Last Sunday different ones arose in the meeting and publicly declared that although they had attended meetings in Pittsburg and Allegheny for years that they had never listened to her equal, and her tests are equally as good."

Mrs. M. E. Kratz writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "The usual amount of the phenomena can be found here as in any large city with for and against element, which are constantly at war with each other, newspapers giving their columns to what is termed an exposure, like that which occurred last week with two of the principal materializing mediums, only to have it contradicted by them and their followers, putting the lie on the 'other fellow.' Yet with all this contention Spiritualism shows a mighty growth. It may be the verification of what was once said by a fake medium to the writer: 'What is the difference how we make a convert to Spiritualism? I can reach fifty to your ten, yet the most of mine is fake work.' The writer sends greetings of good will to the many friends I have met in the various states where my services were given. My present address is 533½ S. Spring street."

Mrs. Hooker McEvoy writes from Edinboro, Pa.: "I have just closed a five weeks' revival service of Spiritualism and Soul-science, in Meadville, Pa. Many earnest seekers and honest workers for truth received the baptismal shower of divine inspiration and soul-quickening power, and were freed from the fetters of blind superstition and dogmatical creeds. The Covenant of the New Dispensation was given by spirit guides as follows: 'We, the undersigned, desire to unite in a band of honest, earnest seekers and workers for truth; that we are willing to follow where truth leads; always seeking higher spiritual unfoldment, and willing to let our light shine in the defense of truth; ever ready to speak and act with soul sincerity and bow in humble submission to Christ's sceptre, the Golden Rod which unites us all as one family in brotherly love, working with him for the uplifting of humanity and the establishing of his kingdom on earth.' Many gladly took the vow and wrote their names under the covenant. Many more will do likewise as opportunity is presented. Copies of the covenant will be sent to anyone who wishes to become a member. Address Mrs. W. W. Kincaid, 305 Lincoln avenue, Meadville, Pa. She has charge of the spiritual services which are being held there, and will gladly answer all honest, earnest questioners regarding this new spiritual band of workers. The small fee of ten cents will be charged, to cover actual cost of copies and mailing to members. I am enjoying a quiet rest of three days with Mr. and Mrs. Frank Collins, at Edinboro, after which I will depart for Coffeyville, Chanute and Fame, Kansas, and from there to California, to continue in the work of the new dispensation. All communications addressed to Fame, Kansas, will reach me."

Arthur F. Milton writes: "I see a Root went rooting in an Indiana town, and found a number of delicacies hard to the surface. Among them is one who could have saved one hundred dollars by having previously sent one dollar to The Progressive Thinker for enlightenment. But when men or women permit their spiritual vision to see only material gain in a cause like ours, may not such experiences be necessary for their salvation.?"

C. A. Buhland writes from Indianapolis, Ind.: "Mrs. Buhland and myself are open to engagements at camps or societies as speakers. I am also well supplied with poems, and would especially delight in rendering them on special occasions or otherwise. We would be pleased to correspond with anyone who represents a society or class of people who wish to organize themselves into a society with the object in view of serving them until they are thoroughly established. We believe we can prove by our efforts that we are capable of good work. Reference will be given. Our terms will be very reasonable. For a short time only our address will be at 341 North East street, Indianapolis, Indiana."

H. H. Glassford writes: "Notice is hereby given that we, the Spiritualists of Corvallis, Oregon, and members of Barrett Lyceum, have organized, to be hereafter known as the "First Spiritual Union of Corvallis. We have only been meeting for six months. There has been a great interest manifested. We have a membership of 20, with a prospect of more. We feel greatly encouraged for the future and ask the good wishes of all Spiritualists. We have much opposition to meet and many difficulties to over come, but by the help of our friends decarnate and the support of our friends incarnate, we hope to succeed."

N. H. Eddy, prominent as a worker in the cause of truth at Buffalo, N. Y., will go to the Lily Dale Camp, July 10.

Moses Hull closed his engagement in Buffalo, N. Y., June 29. He has been there several years, and has done exceedingly well, leaving a favorable impression on all sides.

The Devil's Soliloquy.

One night as the devil sat musing alone in the midst of his cozy warm fire, and trying to figure the difference in guilt between a thief and a liar, his memory turned to the scenes of his youth, and his eyes filled with hot, boiling tears, so he took down his ledger and turned to a page, dated back about six thousand years.

"I suppose," he exclaimed as he glanced through the book, "I'm doing the best that I can, for my business denotes a continual increase, ever since the creation of man.

"I've cribbed a good harvest for 6,000 years and should be content with the yield, and give my opponent permission to have the gleanings or leave the field. I've gathered a very diversified crop of merchants and lawyers galore; I've bound politicians in bundles until all my fingers are sore; I've gamblers and insurance men; I've murderers, forgers and liars, and filled up my furnace with boodlers. I've railroad conductors and doctors to spare, horse traders and preachers to spend; republicans, democrats, pops, mugwumps and two or three newspaper men.

"But there is one class, I'm glad to say can never gain entrance here; their souls are so dirty I'm sure that they would demoralize hell in a year. I refer to that 'thing,' neither human or beast—the carrion crow of the world—who is never happy unless he can feast on the wreck of an innocent girl. A million of years in my warmest rooms his slanders would never atone."

With his fingers he lit an asbestos cigar and, placing his book on a shelf, he muttered, "I may be a very bad man, but I've got some respect for myself."—Ex.

LAKE BRADY CAMP

Claimed to Be All Right—Prominent Speakers Engaged.

To the Editor:—Replying to Nellie C. Mosier's communication of June 21, in The Progressive Thinker, we will say that she is not only not engaged by the Lake Brady Association, but is not on our program; but, under the head of visitors, out of courtesy to a neighbor (she living next door and having told us she would visit the camp when at home), we published her name.

In your issue of June 28, "Correspondent," who has not the courage to sign her name, but who is well known here, makes statements that are utterly false; but for that we would not waste time to answer. In the first place, the Lake Brady Association is not played out. We will open July 13, with Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie, to be followed by Mrs. Carpenter, Mrs. Kauffman, Bro. Herrick, Bro. Dunakin and others, for eight Sundays. True, the larger portion of the grounds are run by a company as a summer resort, but we have retained a portion of the old grounds, your correspondent to the contrary notwithstanding—but she gives us credit with having a nice little grove, etc. Yes, a nicer spot cannot be found in Ohio. We pay no attention to the mutterings against us here, but when one puts them into print, we feel that in justice to our many friends, an explanation should be made; hence we say to our friends, come and see for yourselves, "where we are at."

Lake Brady Camp.

To the Editor:—I wish to say that the statement made by a correspondent in reference to Lake Brady Camp, is false, and was done to injure our meeting. There are a few who claim to be Spiritualists that are so untruthful that we do not allow them to have anything to do with our meeting. We have purchased the new grounds, and have bought a new tent for this summer's camp, and in another year we will have a grand auditorium. I am one of the board of this camp.

Wonewoc Camp, Wis.

The management of the Western Wisconsin Camp Association takes pleasure in announcing to the public, that a rate of one fare and a third for the round trip over all roads of the Western Passenger Association in this section has been secured.

This rate has been granted on the certificate plan, consequently visitors to the camp should be sure and secure a certificate for each ticket purchased, as fare cannot be secured for them without said certificates. If the friends in the surrounding country have any difficulty in securing certificates, take ticket to nearest point in Wisconsin, and no further difficulty will be experienced. From all points in Wisconsin from which the local one way rate to Wonewoc is $3.75 or less, the above rate is assured, and holds good over all lines interested in the Western Passenger Association. Parties or clubs traveling in a body to the camp can purchase round trip tickets at the excursion rate from all stations from which the local one way rate is 50 cents or more. Wonewoc is on the Chicago and Northwestern R'y., between LaCrosse and Madison. All roads connect with the C. & N. W. The Omaha road comes in at Elroy, only eight miles distant from Wonewoc. This makes railroad facilities unusually good.

We have one of the strongest programmes ever presented to a camp audience. Send for illustrated announcements. If you desire a tent, you will be wise to apply early as the space is rapidly filling up. Camp opens July 12, and closes July 28. Come and have a good time.

Lake Pleasant Camp.

The public will have the pleasure of listening to the words of welcome by President Dailey, and to a lecture by the energetic Clerk Blinn, on the opening morning. In the afternoon to a lecture and tests by that constant worker, Tillie Reynolds.

On the following days, there will be given addresses or tests, by Moses Hull, the walking encyclopedia of Biblical lore, and the eloquent orator; by Carrie Twing, the motherly upbuilder and celebrated automatic medium; by Blanche Brainard, the pleasing elocutionist and refined inspirational speaker; by Sarah Byrnes, the veteran student of the spiritual philosophy; by Fannie Allyn, the sarcastic and dramatic speaker and ready improvisator; by May Pepper, the convincing test medium and growing lecturer; by Frank Mason, the cyclone of mental science, and lastly by Mrs. Mason, who will, for the first time appear before a Lake Pleasant audience, and will probably with her keen and lucid thought, intellectually scalp her husband.

People who visit Lake Pleasant this season may justly expect something solid and electric with such an array of spiritual expounders.

Ikabod, the spirit guide of Carrie Twing, will on some evening, instruct and convince his hearers of his spirit identity by his unique tests and humorous language.

May Pepper will be present from August 16 to August 31, and will give frequent public seances.

The unrivaled Schubert Quartette, of Boston, will sing at all the meetings.

Strange Happenings.

Three years ago I visited my nephew in Westchester county. While there he related to me his strange experience. On going to the store one evening, while it was raining hard, he saw a woman of slight figure standing under the electric light. She wore black clothes and had a small black shawl over her head, instead of a hat. He thought it queer to see such a woman out in the rain in such a lonely place. He came back the way he went, and she was still there, looking very white and sad. He crossed the street to speak to her and offer assistance, but before he could speak she vanished. As there was no house near and it was quite light you may guess he was astonished.

About two weeks after the first fright he met a lovely little girl at nearly the same spot. She had long, light golden curls, and was carrying her hat in her hand; it was a broad white hat, with a wreath of flowers on it. He called to the child and she started to cross the street, but disappeared while he was looking at her. I think it was the following day that a man was killed while turning that corner; the carriage upset and his neck was broken.

Do you suppose the mother and daughter were waiting for the father to come. I can't doubt.

I cannot fathom many strange things that have come under my notice. My mother was given power to speak to me just before she passed to the other side. She had not spoken or moved for ten days. I saw her raise her hand as though to shake hands with some one, and asked the question, "Do you really think we are allowed to see our friends when we are near death?" Imagine my surprise to hear my mother's natural voice saying, "Yes. Spirits, spirits!" That was all she said. She passed away soon after. I feel her presence often; at least I hope it is her.

After the Deluge.

Will you let an old patron, who has not troubled you much, only to circulate many of your papers, say a few words? After the deluge of the "Symposium," what? After the other "flood" the captain of the ark planted a vineyard and had a "high old time" on the fruit of it! Your symposium interested me much, and gave me pleasure and profit. I feel like having a good time when all questions can be discussed on all sides, and in the same paper, with candor and with kindness to all parties. What progress this is over a church-fighting past. And the fruit of this vineyard I enjoy greatly.

Now to your question, about science or religion being the basis or the whole of Spiritualism. If the present were not so full of the ideas of the past teachings, there would not seem to be much trouble in settling it. We are told that as something cannot be made of nothing, this grand universe of suns and worlds, or mind, matter and force, always was; that it was never created. Thus there can be no "creation," as we have been taught, but that all was and is governed by unerring laws; and that there is "nothing permanent but change," and all under law, from everlasting to everlasting.

Now, we find that all things are made under law in this world, and when the earth had ripened enough man came and under law, too, his physical, mental and spiritual being. (I use the words as commonly accepted.) Now, too we find that if man will learn and obey all the laws of his being, he will grow into a glorious manhood, and this will be his "salvation," both here and hereafter.

The Greeks said, "know thy very self." If this had been taught in all the ages of the church, what a different standing we might have now! Man might be blooming in all the nobility of his true development, instead of suffering under the ignorant teachings of an ignorant church. To clear away this rubbish is our first duty if we are to make a harvest to feed and brighten this world. A "religion" is a thing of an ignorant past. What it did was to chain and stop the progress of the race.

With the "new heavens and the new earth" we can touch angel hands that are bringing us light and knowledge to redeem the race from a dark and selfish past, both in church and state.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. "An American Girl"; Q. What is your opinion of the stage? In what way did Sara Bernhardt begin her stage career?

A. The stage is capable of being the best and purest educator, and on the other hand, of being the most depraved in its influences. The better class of theaters we believe tend toward elevation of thought as well as furnishing amusement. Many are struck with the glitter before the curtain, and strive for the coveted prize given to a great actor. They find that success depends on incessant toil, or they have to make their way slowly and with self-sacrifice; to surmount obstacles, and weep over defeats brought by the greed and heartlessness of others, and not one in a score of these aspirants has the real genius which will carry them to the front ranks of success. Sara Bernhardt was no exception. She gained her position by indefatigable labor. If "An American Girl" has the courage, the strength, the indomitable will, and above all, the genius—which is a beautiful form and face, an appreciative mind, a clear, loving voice, cultured until well under control—she may hope for success, if she patiently strives for it. Let her not delude herself that even with success she will have an easy life, for none are more inexorable and exacting. Only a strong constitution can withstand the exactions made by the hard study, late hours, and hasty journeys between engagements, strain the most enduring.

The stage is all right and its morality will compare favorably with that of any other business. It will be to those who enter on its pursuit, moral or immoral, as they choose to make it.

It affords opportunity for the display of the most rare and exalted talents, but the fame it bestows is evanescent and unsatisfying. We believe in all doing that which they can do well, and they will be best pleased if it is their highest. Mistake not, however, desire to do, for the capability. Know that there is more happiness in the harmonious home, than in even the hour of triumphant stage success; one is the head which gives the joy of health every day, the other the sparkling wine quaffed at rare intervals of a life time.

An Announcement.

To the Editor:—The work of the spirit band from the Star Circle in the spirit world, as explained in Rending the Vail: "There are many different circles or bands in the spirit world, and the Star Circle is one of the strongest and best known. The spirits of this circle have banded themselves together for the purpose of benefiting those on the lower plane than themselves, and especially on the earth plane. . . . These spirits are doing a noble work for both the spiritual and material worlds. By their thoughts and actions, they are bringing sunlight into many darkened lives." (p. 286).

The intention of this delegated band, of which Prof. Denton, Dr. Reed, Thomas Paine and Prof. Faraday are the most active ones, was to give to the world three books that afford mankind a full and comprehensive view of that side of life to which all of earth's children are nearing. Two of these books have already been given—Rending the Vail, and Beyond the Vail; and now this same band, with the same medium (W. W. Aber), are engaged in the production of the third book, which, as has been previously announced, will treat on Life in the Higher Spheres. Three seances will be given each week. The one on Tuesday evenings will be given for the benefit of visitors. Those on Sunday and Thursday evenings will be devoted to the work in hand. A suitable desk for writing, and a typewriter are provided in view of the entire circle. The work will require many months.

On the evening of June 24, the first of these seances was held. This was for visitors, of whom four were present, and were delighted with the seance. The charge for admission is one dollar. Mr. Aber will be able to lodge a few visitors, and perhaps board them. All communications in regard to details will be addressed to W. W. Aber, Spring Hill, Kansas.

There are thousands of people who are earnestly desiring proofs of spirit return and communion with their "loved ones gone before." Here is an opportunity where no suspicion of fraud is possible, an opportunity that to those who can appreciate it, is of incalculable value. The question propounded by Job and echoed throughout the world for thousands of years, can be answered here by the most positive demonstration.

THE SUBJECTIVE MIND.

Hudson Partly Right and Partly Wrong.

There has been much controversy between Spiritualists and others, over the theories advanced in T. J. Hudson's book, the Law of Psychic Phenomena. Many writers have a prejudice against the subjective mind hypothesis, because it seeks to explain that many of the manifestations of psychic phenomena do not proceed from spirits of the dead. Now, to my way of thinking, truth is truth, no matter where it is found. I believe that the subjective mind theory explains most of the phenomena of hypnotism. The leading hypnotists and writers on the subject of hypnotism accept it as the true theory. Who are competent to judge of the correctness of a law better than those who are daily and hourly witnessing the manifestations of phenomena which are governed by that law?

T. J. Hudson's theory of the sub-conscious self or subjective mind, in relation to the phenomena of hypnotism, is the most nearly correct one of which we know at the present time; but because it is correct as regards hypnotism, it does not prove that it covers the whole field of psychic phenomena.

There are many things in the Bible that are proper to live by, but this does not prove that the whole book is perfect. Many authors strike beautiful chords in the reader's mind, which may be turned into dis-chords, by reading the next chapter. This is the case with Spiritualists. Because Prof. Hudson explains that many of the so-called spirit messages proceed from no higher source than the medium's subjective mind, the Spiritualists claim that his theories are wrong.

The Law of Psychic Phenomena is one of the most popular works read by students of hypnotism and kindred phenomena. If its theories did not hold some truth, would the book be endorsed by teachers and practitioners of hypnotism? It is true, however, that many hypnotists have a material conception of life, and know little or nothing of the phenomena of Spiritualism.

The mistake that Prof. Hudson made was in pushing his theory too far, and talking of phenomena of which he had but an imperfect knowledge. If he was a well-developed clairvoyant, would he have written as he did? He would undoubtedly have modified his subjective mind idea, and he would not have killed the objective mind with the death of the physical body. Could he but see with clairvoyant power, he would, perhaps, say that the objective mind does not become annihilated at death, but lives on in spirit life, acting more synchronously with the subjective mind than when the soul was limited by an earthly body.

Can a hypnotized person be made to commit crime?

I wish to explain in this connection that hypnotism and mesmerism are two different states. A great error is made bymany writers in using the word hypnotism to cover all conditions of control which one person can hold over another. Some persons say that hypnotism and mesmerism are the same. I say they are not the same, and an examinaton of the literature of the subject will bear me out in my assertion. If a person wishes to experiment, he may study hypnotism and mesmerism as two different conditions, and if he operates by mesmeric manipulations in one case, and by hypnotic processes in another, he will get different results. Hypnotism is an inferior form of mind control. It deals with the physical senses. You hypnotize a person by lodging an impression on his mind through the five physical senses. In mesmerizing your thought is placed in the mind of the subject by the power of magnetism.

The reader must not use the two hypnotism and mesmerism interchangeably, as it is improper. It has been written that a hypnotized person is not a slave to the operator's power, that the operator cannot make him commit a crime. On the other hand it has been written that the mesmerized subject is a slave to the operator's power; that his personality, his every thought and deed is controlled by the mesmerist.

I believe that hypnotized subjects will often refuse suggestions that conflict with their ideas of right, and I believe that a mesmerized subject that is perfectly magnetized and wholly under the control of the mortal operator, will obey every suggestion, even to committing a crime. The following quotation is from Dr. Moll:

"A dentist of Rouen, named Levy, assaulted a girl in the magnetic sleep. The case is remarkable because the girl's mother was present and noticed nothing. Levy had placed his dentist's chair so as not to be seen. Brouardel gave his opinion on the case and Levy was imprisoned for ten years."

Many writers on mind control claim that it is impossible to cause subjects to inflict injuries on themselves or others while under the operator's control. Most of these writers are those who adhere to the art of hypnotism, and whose knowledge of the laws of magnetism or mesmerism as practiced by the adepts of Eastern countries, is very limited.

Hypnotism as taught and practiced in America is as a general thing very different from magnetism as used by the fakirs of India or the Lamas of Thibet.

The subjective mind of a hypnotized subject does not manifest such powers as the subjective mind of the magnetized subject does. The average hypnotic subject is not clairvoyant, does not catch the operator's thought, is not able to psychometrize articles or do any of the wonderful things which are possible to the mesmerized subject. It is the magnetized subject that reads every thought and sensation of the operator; that sees clairvoyantly at the operator's mental command. There is a hopeless mix-up of the two conditions, and it will never be any different, as long as there are three or four different schools of hypnotism and mesmerism, each fighting the other, and contending for different theories. Hypnotism and mesmerism must be looked at in the proper light, before any one can come to the correct conclusion whether an entranced person will commit crimes or not.

In regard to the moving of heavy bodies without physical contact, I would say that it is all explained by the theory of magnetism. The magnetic power dwelling in each person—that force which Hudson calls the subjective mind—is the agent that produces this phenomena. The adepts in magic claim that a medium or psychic can sometimes move bodies without physical contact by the exercise of his own magnetic power, and without the aid of disembodied spirits; that it is not always necessary to receive help from beings out of the earthly form, but that the manifestations are greatly helped, and sometimes depend entirely on disembodied spirits.

Prof. Hudson claims that objects may be moved by the power of the living person's subjective mind without introducing spirits of the dead. He is quite right as the teachings of occultism show. The Spiritualists often say that the moving of bodies without physical contact is caused by spirits of the dead. They are quite right. Both Prof. Hudson and the Spiritualists are partly right, but the mistake is made when each claims that the whole of the phenomena is produced by the cause which they assert.

I believe that clairvoyant, clairaudient and psychometric power, and independent slate-writing, automatic writing, so-called spirit portrait painting, etc., can be shown in all the varied manifestations by the subjective mind of the medium, without the intervention of spirits.

The fault of the Spiritualists consists in claiming that all phenomena produced by strange and unseen forces are caused by spirits of the dead. Man is a spirit here and now, and when his physical body is in the right condition he can use his spiritual faculties, and by reading the sitter's mind, he can give wonderful "tests." All is not gold that glitters, neither do all messages or tests given by mediums proceed from spirit friends.

It is not given to all persons to have all the occult knowledge; that is why some are right as regards one point, while they are totally wrong as regards another.

A vast fund of information concerning Spiritism and Occultism is contained in the two books, Art Magic and Ghost Land (premium books of The Progressive Thinker), and every student of Spiritualistic or occult phenomena should read and study them thoroughly.

In conclusion I will say that Prof. Hudson is right regarding hypnotism, but that his theory regarding spiritism is greatly befogged; and that the Spiritualists are right in believing that a person retains his identity after death, and is able to give messages from the spirit world, but the Spiritualists are in error when they say there is no such thing as the subjective mind, and that all trance and other psychic phenomena are produced by disembodied spirits. Gloucester, Mass.

SOCRATES.

Man, Medium, Martyr, Rationalist.

Twenty-three hundred and seventy-one years ago the famous Socrates was born in what was then the intellectual capital of the world.

"Lives of great men all remind us
We can make our lives sublime,
And departing leave behind us
Footprints in the sands of time."

So let us look at some of the footprints that the son of Sophroniscus has left for us.

It is not easy to think or speak intelligently of the great philosophers and religious thinkers of Greece. Their name is Legion. Such truth of thought, such beauty and grace, such cheerfulness, harmony and keen appreciation could surely spring from nothing less noble than the profound and permanent inspirations of the spirit of Humanity.

The modern student becomes, or at least is apt to become so enamored of Greek art, philosophy, poetry, architecture that he is belated before he gets to the reality of Greek religion.

Here indeed more than elsewhere the intellectual evolution of religion is illustrated. As Mr. J. L. Jones, the Editor and scholar, has said: "Here we may see primitive religion sprouting at the tomb, budding at the fireside, blooming into nature worship, ripening into a deification of moral principles, glorifying and personifying the motives and emotions that belong to the higher life of the human soul."

Apollo was conceived as an incarnate combination of beauty and wisdom, grace and loveliness, gentleness and courage. Athenae was en-spiritualized as the Divine Ideal of womanhood, whose heart was informed by a brain, whose feelings were stayed and strengthened by reason. But not even this divine concept could fill out the measure of Greece's Ideal womanhood, and so there must be added the Mother of Sorrow to guard the hearth and brood over the productive forces of life. To this is added Aphrodite, human love lifted to celestial potency, the best thought of which was a perception of the divine fury, not of lust, but of refining, elevating passion. The enthusiasm of the blood; the living fluids.

Amid all the glorious surroundings of this Greek life Socrates was born, a common, no! a very uncommon citizen of Athens. In youth he served as a soldier, and afterwards earned a living by making images.

His ambition for personal culture and improvement attracted a wealthy patron whose generosity enabled him to get instruction from the best teachers in various branches.

Having thus received knowledge, with a noble ambition, he wished to use it for the general public benefit. To do this he established no school, nor had he any secret doctrine held back for initiates only.

Like Sakya Muni in India, he could say that as a teacher he had held nothing back; no closed hand, filled with special gems for a privileged or a wealthy few. His law "was a law of grace for all."

He saw that the youth of the city were becoming demoralized by luxury, were being led astray by witty scoffers, a quick-witted set who sneered at all sacred things. He left business and devoted his time to talking and questioning in the market place, the square, the workshops, the public walks, or wherever he could get a public that would listen. Mechanics, sailors, artists, magistrates and philosophers—with all he discoursed and questioned on moral principles; religions and social duties, even the sciences, arts and trades in which they were engaged. He had a large intellectual head, and great personal ugliness, the "perfect bloom" of which was forgotten as his face became animated in his discourse. The anecdote is told of a physiognomist who interpreted his features as showing sensuality, etc. Socrates in his frankness admitted this tendency, but had by self conquest or will brought it under right control.

By constitution he was very robust, he could endure hunger and cold with indifference, but the climate of Greece is delightful. He was abstemious, and wore the same clothes the year round. He always went barefoot, even amid the severe frosts of Thrace, and would not receive pay or "presents" for his instruction.

He passed his life in voluntary and contented poverty.

"Poor and content is rich and rich enough.
For riches endless are as poor as winter
To him who even fears he shall be poor."

He felt himself sustained by a fine conviction that he was a child of destiny, sent into the world to fulfill a religious mission. Taunted in the streets, he treated insults with quiet indifference. He disapproved of the metaphysical cast of many of the philosophers of the day, as leading to casuistry in regard to the nature of God and the Soul. His mind was of an eminently practical bias, hence right action was ever his object.

He reasoned frequently, from external effects to spiritual or supersensuous causes. He said: "Reflect that your own mind directs your body by its volitions, and then you must be convinced that the Intelligence of the universe disposes all things according to his pleasure and his wisdom. Can you imagine your eye capable of discerning distant things, and the eye of God cannot see all things? Or that your mind can contemplate distant countries, and the Supreme Mind cannot attend at once to all the affairs of the universe? He the omnipresent Inner Life of all? Learn from the things that are produced to infer the existence of an invisible Power and to reverence the Divinity, the Spirituality of the universe. As he might say:

Think of the innate folly of wrong doing. "There are phenomena in our being not revealed in the Gospel of digestion"—there are tides and currents in human nature not mapped out on the globe of the brain. It has been well said that "the soul is larger than logic." Not only is it cognizant of the objective world—the world of rock and bone—but it lies in the hemisphere of Intuition, whose solemn sweeps of darkness are pierced by immortal splendors. And despite all the cant of "Positive Philosophy," of nescience and pessimism, and all the quibbles about design, it retains and ever will retain, the spontaneous conviction that these harmonious forms spring from an interior Idea. All things are held by the law of attraction. That within this universal frame abides Living Spirit, moving it to a purpose, and this way and that turning its flashing wheels. But as we have seen, in past discourse there is no argument against the sensual conception of life, stronger than that which springs up in the Sensualist's own experience, in his endeavors to reason out his own position, in his attempt at self-justification, in a nightmare consciousness of incongruity, in the lightning streams of recollection. And even when sunk below all this, there is wanting the ease of nature and organic fitness—still there is the sense of lacking sense—the dreary sense of paralysis and loss. Like one who lies down in torpor among the dead, yet he is not as the dead. They rest peacefully. But he slumbers in a vague horror or wakes startled by ghastly shadows and the texts on the tombs.

Or, suppose from the comparative moderation of his indulgences, or the hardihood of his constitution, he is spared until late in life—how peculiarly sad and awful must be the Old Age of the Sensualist. At that period when a good man's hold upon outward things grows infirm, his spirit may fall back upon its own resources, and the treasures of wisdom and the recollections of vanished times are ranged around those inner galleries fresh and fragrant still. Nor is his age a useless burden to others. He remains yet to enrich the world he is about to leave, with the lesson of a virtuous example, and the legacies of a ripe experience; while faith lends a new beauty to his whitening hairs, and from out its dim windows the soul sends flashes of perpetual youth!

But upon what can the worn-out sensualist fall back? What riches cluster about his heart that are fadeless yet? What memories can he call up that he would not rather have buried forever? What useful boon does he bequeath to the world from which his feet are slipping? Alas! the giant shadows are falling around him. Years have swept away the companions of his pleasure. Yet he spends his last hours in teasing his senses into a paralytic zest, and the flame of passion, impotent and smouldering, is the only lamp to light him through the dark valley. For finally must come the "last scene," the death of the Sensualist. His heart, decaying for years, halts at last. The crumbling temple of his body grows livid and cold. The end of all delights is at hand. A lump of moral gangrene. His mind in fitful visions quits the racked frame, goes wandering back into that sunny world which to him has been so luxurious—which he shall see no more. His chance, God given, he threw away! Or he starts upward to those great realities which he has treated as dreams and fictions. Few are there to close his stiffening eyelids, for sensualism is selfish! His true friends he has neglected, he has cast from him. The associates of his gay hours do not like death-beds and trouble. He must sink to the untrodden land of darkness alone. Alone!

Such are the consolations of the dying sensualist—such the value of the things in which he has delighted and the friendships he has made.

Well might the gay, wealthy, handsome, dashing Alcibiades say of him: "No mortal speech has ever excited in me such emotions as are kindled by this magician; my heart leaps like an inspired Corybantb My inmost soul is stung by his words. I often weep tears of regret to think how vain and inglorious is the life I lead. Nor am I the only one who weeps like a child and despairs of himself. Many others are affected even as I am."

Not only should we consider the positive results of sensualism; but what is lost by it, the true enjoyment of life, the best use of its hours, the transcendent vision and the blessed consciousness which looks beyond and overcomes the world and all its evils. This is the corroding evil of any degree of sensualism—it makes this world all and eclipses every higher good. Is there a more fatal fallacy than that which decides us to satisfy our souls and employ our faculties with that which must "perish in the using?"

HIS MEDIUMSHIP.

If you would know the secrets of wisdom, render yourself "worthy." "The secrets of wisdom are the double to that which is." Fathom that thought. Humble yourself in the dust! Seek to become fit for the communication of Divine Secrets which may not be penetrated by man, but are imparted alone to those who consult and adore and obey the Divinities. Work—work for Goodness, or die the death. Work earnestly, then shall the spiritual perceptions be opened and you shall understand that there is a Being whose eye pierceth through all nature, all space, pervading all time, and whose bounty and care can know no other bounds than those fixed by his own creation.

If men only believed the truth they would abstain from all base actions, even in private, knowing that nothing can be unknown to the angels. There is no better way to true glory than to try to be good rather than to seem so.

He inferred the immortality of the soul from the fact that it gave life to the body. Also from the phenomena of dreams, and the intuitive belief of all ages and nations. Also by the eternity of the divinity to whom he believed the soul to be allied by nature and similarity of spirit force.

In his inspirational discourse he described the sufferings of the wicked by picturing the souls as horribly diseased and subject to fearful pains which were occasioned by their vices in their bodies. The moral sense in man as the true interpreter of Deity. Conscience which sees right and wrong was the ever present voice of Deity. He said that divine favors could not be procured by prayers but must be merited by a blameless life, and the truest and best way of serving Deity was to help to quicken the moral intuitions of men.

We all know of his prayers to the Pan (The All) to make us beautiful in soul, and may all our outward things be in harmony with the Inner Life. Teach us to see wisdom as the only riches and give us only such wealth as the good can use to enjoy.

He often declared that the devotion of his time and talents to the instruction of others had been enjoined on him by the Daemon, by dreams, and by every mode of divination by which they order things to be done. He often referred to his Daemon or guide, who he says warned him what to avoid. This voice was with him from his youth. It often forbade him to do things, but never prompted him to any particular action.

Plato says of him that when about to cross a river the usual daemon sign was given to him, and when this takes place it always prohibits him from accomplishing what he was about to do. "In the present instance he seemed to hear a certain voice which would not suffer him to depart until he had made an explation—as if he had in some way offended a divine nature. "I am therefore a prophet, though not a perfectly worthy one. But just such a one as a man who knows his letters indifferently well—merely sufficient for what concerns himself."

By this "Daemon" some thought that he merely meant the voice of conscience and that he adopted the universal belief of his age about spirits, etc., angels or God's children and men, or as a guide or guardian. These were Genii—some believe in two such attendant spirits, one being good and one being bad. Hence the saying, "Be careful not to incense thy genius"—or "Be reconciled with thy genius."

When a man died this "Genius" returned to the universal Source of Spirit. He even spoke of it as a "Divine Sign," or a "Supernatural Voice."

Socrates was distinguished for cheerfulness, equability of temper and the most inflexible integrity. He bore with his shrewish wife as patiently as a classic "Mr. Caudle" could have done. Twice he served in the councils of state and in the army.

In Plato's account, in the "Krito," we are shown an old neighbor stealing his way before daylight into the cell which contained Socrates, with some well laid plans for his escape. Tenderly but firmly does Socrates lay these plans aside as an indignity to the law which he must not offer.

Below is his address to the Judges who condemned him to drink the cup of poison hemlock:

"But you too, O judges, it behooves to be of good hope about death, and to believe that this at least is true,—there can be no evil befall a good man, whether he be alive or dead, nor are his affairs uncared for by the gods. Neither has this thing happened to me by chance, for I am persuaded that to die now and be released from worldly affairs is best for me, and this is why the sign did not turn me back. Wherefore I bear no malice at all against my accusers or against those who have condemned me, but as it was not with this idea, but rather with the intent to do me injury, that they accused and voted against me, it is right that they should be blamed. This favor nevertheless I ask of them: When my sons are grown up, avenge yourselves, fellow citizens, upon them, by tormenting them just as I have tormented you, if they appear to care for riches or for anything else above virtue; and if they pretend to be something when they are really nothing, then reproach them as I have reproached you, with not caring for what they ought, and with thinking themselves to be something when they are worth nothing at all. If you do this, I shall have received justice at your hands—I as well as my sons. But now it is time for us to go away, I to die, you to live. Which of us is going to the better fate is unknown to all save God."—From Socrates' closing address to his judges as reported by Plato.

From his life as man, medium, martyr to his mediumship, let us all learn the lesson of life, to face toward the Inner Sunlight of the Spirit.

Secrets of Personal Magnetism Laid Bare.

Thousands of Dollars' Worth of Books on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism to be Given Away by a Noted Philadelphia College.

Hon. James R. Kennedy, of Pennsylvania, Chairman of the Committee on Distribution.

Every One May Now Learn All the Secrets of These Mysterious Sciences at His Own Home.

Hon JAMES R. KENNEY, of Pennsylvania.
Ex-Mayor of Reading' Pa., noted orator, author and scientist.

"I can honestly and conscientiously say from my long experience in dealing with people and from my personal acquaintance with many of the most prominent men in this country, that there is no other one thing which will help one so much in life as a thorough knowledge of Personal Magnetism," says Hon. James R. Kenney, "and for this reason I accepted the chairmanship of the committee on distribution of works on Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism for the American College of Sciences of Philadelphia.

"The real secrets of Personal Magnetism and Hypnotism have always been jealously guarded by the few who knew them and kept them from the masses of the people. One who understands these sciences has an inestimable advantage in the race of life. I want to put this information in the hands of every ambitious man and woman in this country.

"The American College of Sciences has just appropriated $10,000 to be used in printing books for free distribution, and if this does not supply the demand it will appropriate $10,000 more. The books are absolutely free. They do not cost you a single cent.

"Tell me what kind of work you are engaged in; or, if sick, the disease from which you suffer, and I will send you the book which will put you on the road to success, health and strength. It matters not how successful you are. I will guarantee to help you achieve greater success. The work which I will send you is from the pens of the most eminent specialists of the country: it is richly illustrated with the finest half tone engravings, and is intensely interesting from start to finish. It has been the means of changing the whole current in the lives of hundreds of persons who were ready to give up in despair. You can learn at home in a few days and use personal magnetism in your daily work without the knowledge of your most intimate friends. You can use it to influence others; you can use it to keep others from influencing you. You can positively cure the most obstinate chronic diseases and banish all bad habits.

"If you have not met with the business or social success which you desire; if you are not successful in winning and holding friends; if you are sick, and tired of taking drugs that do not cure; if you care to develop your memory or any other mental faculty to a higher state of perfection; or, lastly, if you wish to possess that subtle, invisible, intangible power that sways and rules the minds of men, you should write me to-day and let me send you a free copy of our new book. It will prove a revelation to you." Address JAMES R. KENNEY, P L 21, Commercial Union Building, Philadelphia, Pa.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD

A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

STRAY THOUGHTS

Amid Scenes of Past Life and Work.

On the 12th ult. I was called to take charge of the last service over the worn-out physical form that had been for 83 years the abiding place of the spirit of Hannah Albertson, at Sterling, Ill. I remained several days with the family and the scenes of past years and work in the various reforms in which we were mutually interested were brought to mind some of which may interest the readers of The Progressive Thinker that has been a visitor in this genial home for many years.

In the first place it showed, as such occasions always do, the importance of having our philosophy presented in its true purity, as there are no occasions that afford so good an opportunity to reach those not informed as to our beliefs. Many people attend a Spiritualist funeral that would not think of going to a lecture on the subject, and in a sympathetic state that is more susceptible to spiritual teaching.

The large audience listened to the discourse in rapt attention, and the papers gave lengthy reports of the same in a fair spirit.

The Albertsons came from New York state to Illinois in 1841, by way of the lakes, stopping one day in Chicago, taking their belongings in prairie schooners to their claim, where they still reside. They discovered the Mineral Springs, and with others, for years kept a sanitarium, selling a few years ago to the Mineral Springs Association. Their home has always been a place of welcome rest to the weary workers for the cause of Spiritualism, which they espoused about fifty years ago; and William Denton, A. J. Davis, Emma Hardinge, Sophronia Warner, J. S. Loveland, and nearly all our prominent workers have shared their generous hospitality for longer or shorter periods.

Before they became Spiritualists they belonged to the society of Friends (Quakers) who always acted according to the "moving of the spirit." If the spirit moved any one to speak at their meetings, they did so; otherwise they spent the time in silence. In my childhood I remember attending meetings where not a word was spoken. At times you would see some one jerking, as mediums often do going under influence.

The Friends were a peculiar people. They used the plain language, that is, they used the personal pronouns thou, thine and thee, as is taught by all grammarians but never used by them, they substituting the plural you and yours therefor. They called every one by their full names,—no master or mistress in their vocabulary. They were bitterly opposed to churches and ceremonials of every kind, were practical non-resistants, and would not take part in the "general training" which was compulsory on every adult male citizen, they being excused by special act, on account of religious convictions.

They always cared for their poor and dependent, not by building asylums but by taking them in some of their homes and mutually sharing the expense.

They were just and honest, so were none of them very rich, but being industrious and frugal were generally well-to-do.

They repudiated the general form of marriage, but instead they appointed a committee of two men and two women to attend as witnesses, the two persons making their own contract. I had a sister so married, and I well remember the ceremony. They stood and joining their right hands, he said, "Before these witnesses, I take thee, Rachel Worth, to be my wife, promising unto thee, with divine assistance, to to a kind, loving and devoted husband, till separated by death." She made the same promise, only changing name and sex. I always thought this superior to the customary method. They did not always, however, obtain that "divine assistance" necessary to complete success.

There were orthodox Friends, and an outgrowth, the Hicksites, the latter denying the divinity of Christ. We, of course, came from the latter stock.

After the advent of Modern Spiritualism, a large number became satisfied from evidence that the spirit moving them instead of being the spirit of God, as supposed, was that of some departed friend, and a large number became Spiritualists. I have never yet, however, found one thus born and educated who took kindly to the idea of Spiritualist churches, Revs., pastors, christenings, prayers at "public places to be seen of men," Easter services, etc. Friends call it anti-Christ; when they become Spiritualists they think it anti-spiritual.

Mr. Albertson is now 85 years old, has a fresh, unwrinkled face, does all sorts of farm work including ploughing and climbing trees to trim them. He really looks younger than when last I saw him ten years ago. He has been active in every reform movement, was an abolitionist in antebellum days and a friend of A. T. Foss, Wendell Phillips, C. B. Campbell, Parker Pillsbury, and other workers for the abolition of chattel slavery.

He reminded me of our first meeting at a celebration in their city, July 4, 1869, on which occasion I was the speaker, the first oration on such an occasion delivered by a woman. I had forgotten the circumstances of the occasion until recalled by a visit to the grounds.

I was much pleased when sitting at their well-filled table to see no tea or coffee served, and they told me they seldom used meat and had no use for doctors.

I enjoyed for five days the sweet country air amid catalpa blooms, sweet syringas, roses and the music in the beautiful shade trees of the many birds that filled the morning hours with melody, hoping to help the family a little to become accustomed to the physical absence of the sweet soul that had "rent the veil."

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature; Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 26. CHICAGO, ILL., JULY 12, 1902. NO. 659.

OPINIONS AND CRITICISMS.

Sar'gis' Views Concerning Various Subjects, Persons, and Matters of Interest.

To the Editor:—People who get out of the habit of writing are liable to lose both the ambition and knack of composition. And this attempt is more to prevent collapse than because of thoughts struggling for utterance. Then again, The Progressive Thinker has been so filled with good things, as a rule well written, that there has been no incentive to take up its space with the common-places of gossip.

An excuse, or a text, as you may choose it, is found in the April 19 number in the editorial, "Do Not Worry." It seems a sort of protest on the part of the Editor against the critics who think all articles should be such as they could agree with. The editorial is timely and it harmonizes with what has been often referred to in these screeds.

Spiritualists come from all creeds and all sorts of people—orthodox, heterodox, Catholic, Protestant, agnostics, materialists, nothingarians, and even from the preachers and priests. And all these, by early educational influences, instilled with certain preconceptions about gods, no gods, creeds, etc., and not one of them having even a conception of spirit, spirits, after-death life, or anything akin to what Spiritualism has disclosed as to these things.

Of course these people when they talk or write as naturally think along old educated lines as they breathe. They are on our platforms, in our books, in the newspaper press, and everywhere. And they find somebody to agree with them. A newspaper must give consideration to all—if it is to be such in the proper sense. The Progressive Thinker numbers its readers by the thousands. Now, Sar'gis has a very good opinion of himself and flatters his self-consciousness that the world would be better off if it allowed him to run it—but your subscription list would be very small if no one subscribed save those who wanted to hear what he had to say.

Take one number, at random, the one from which the text is taken for example: Its interesting features are a discourse from Mrs. Richmond, Hudson Tuttle's column—either worth a year's subscription—a letter from the "dead" Prof. Denton; one of those evangelistic "Home Circle" articles; Dawbarn, on the "Aural Self;" the current mirror of the "General Survey," to say nothing of the editorial and miscellaneous contents. Why should anybody complain? Does a guest find fault with the menu of a Palmer House dinner and give up his room and take to the street because there are dishes on it he doesn't like, or because he can't eat it all? No, he orders what appeals to his appetite or tickles his palate, and leaves the other dishes to the other guests who fill the dining-room. So it is with the sensible reader of a newspaper published for everybody. The Palmer hostelry doesn't pay expenses with your order only, but with those of the aggregate patrons. This is not an original idea but is only given for the benefit of the original fool dyspeptic.

Some people, for example, object to Professor Dawbarn's ideas, and Prof. Dawbarn consoles himself with the conviction that only ignorance is the barrier between them, while the objector calls it—not the ego, but egotism. Shall The Progressive Thinker stop the amusement of the rest of us because of this difference between author and critic?

Again, Brother Moses Hull is taken up with debates and colleges and classes, and instead of "Prof." he prefixes "Rev." to his "ads," and announces as a part of his curriculum, "Bible exegesis." Now, this is because "Our Moses" was born and bred to the priesthood and discussion. Debate is his native air, and without a Jamieson, life would be monotonous. And by the way, was ever, since that change of base on the road to Damascus, such a miraculous conversion as that one where these two mutually converted each other? If Dawbarn's vibrations and aural tentacles can explain this mutual and marvelous manifestation of intellectual power, he is richly entitled to a place in the academy of immortals.

The Progressive Thinker contains many gems as well as some things not so gemmy, and if you have no objection to a somewhat gossipy criticism of some of its current contents you can print this. If it in any way grates on the harmony of the editorial sphere, the waste-basket, like the omnibus, is never full.

And first: The article in the number of April 26, by Nora Batchelor has more common sense in it than tomes of learned discourse about vibrations, the sub-conscious and the sub-jective. It is, if made a living idea, worth more to Spiritualism and Spiritualists than colleges top-heavy with professorships before there is a student or scholar. From the Nicean council down to Luther, Calvin, Joseph Smith and Alexander Dowie, poor humanity has been afflicted with "Bible exegesis," yet there is more practical wisdom in the files of Poor Richard's Almanac than in all the rosary of its pronouncements and proverbs. Is it not time to get from under the wisdom of parchment and papyrus, written by men far inferior in real knowledge to our common school graduate, and allow the popular mind to come in contact with facts?

It is very funny to hear the wise ones discourse about the uneducated mediums and then pray to a father who has never got beyond a "which"—but what's the use?—it takes all sorts of people to make a newspaper pay.

People may talk as they please, may philosophize as they will, the one effective way to educate the mind is to hit it with a fact and a demonstration. And the day is gone by when people can be won by abusing them or their ways. True, there are Spiritualists who are not scholars or scholastics, but to ridicule them and apply depreciative epithets to them is not the way to inspire them or any other class of people to come to school.

You will see mediums whose life has been one of toil and labor, who have worked for what they have, and given of their earnings to help educate those who never work—yet they have common sense and common hearts. And if they have sensitive gifts, they will not talk nonsense even if their grammar or text-book smattering may not be of the strutting degree. No, no, there need be no fear of the platform being taken from the learned by their vulgarities. They are neither numerous nor cheeky—but will be found glad listeners if those on the platform give them something to think of.

What a comment in this regard is the list of over thirty of the platform people of the Spiritualist movement so far, as given by J. S. Loveland in The Progressive Thinker of May 17. Beginning with himself the first regular lecturer, in all the list up to thirty, there was not one but was an educated man or woman. No equal number of names in any church or profession in the last half century can surpass them for ability and intellectual brilliance. And it goes without saying that if the uneducated—A. J. Davis, Mrs. Richmond and Mrs. Watson—their equals in literary style and culture are without peers in any of the learned professions. And Hudson Tuttle, a farmer's boy and still a farmer has no superior as a writer on the most profound topics, and in learning overtops the college professor. Any or all these are too far advanced to be caught in such shallow work as Psychical Research has given to the world.

But, who has ever advocated ignorant and uneducated mediumship? Or who talks about it among the rank and file of Spiritualists? It is a new fad that has come up as an annex to "organization."

One of your correspondents puts an inquiry that pricks the bubble: "What shall we do with the graduates?" The whole thing is illustrated by that question. The writer has been listening to lectures for many years, yet has escaped being afflicted with these illiterate people. True, people and mediums have been met whose speech was faulty in its idiomatic euphony, but such are everywhere. One of the most accomplished men ever met with—a Harvard man at that—even in his public speech would persist in saying "mornin' and evenin.'" The whole so-called argument sounds as if forced.

No one need object to a school, a college, or a dozen of them. This is a free country and people do as they please—or can—whether it pleases you or me, or not. But no one is justified in decrying his fellow, because he may not agree in all things. This everlasting scolding about people who do not do as some want them to do, is in worse taste and more vulgar in form than any lapse in grammar or geography by a medium. It is there that criticism is in order. For one of the high privates in the rear ranks of Spiritualists, the title "medium" is dignified enough—Rev., Prof., Ph. D., or even M. D., has no credential over us privates as teachers, mentors, dictators, or as authorized to scold us as being ignorant, stingy or otherwise. It is on this line legitimate protest arises.

Again, some of our leaders lapse into dogmatism and want of good temper that weakens their influence. A case in point in which this "scribe" is put outside the pale is found in a very able "essay" of Prof. Lockwood in your issue of April 24. It is here mentioned because it is in line with the text. Here is the record: In an address by Mrs. Richmond reviewing the Mrs. Piper incident and the courage of the scientific gentlemen of the Psychic Research Society, published in The Progressive Thinker of Nov. 30, 1901, she among other things said:

"If there is that which is beyond science, and there is the great realm of superconsciousness in human existence, that realm can take possession of science, can make science its handmaiden."

Now, Brother Lockwood, after five months' interval with many epithets to give it emphasis, calls this "ignorance," and adds that it is more like making "a mop" than a handmaiden—if anybody can see a scientific point in such a parallel. But it is not for any defense of Mrs. Richmond that this allusion is made—she needs no championship—but it is because of the hit personal to the undersigned that follows the "ignorance."

In commenting on this Piper address of Mrs. Richmond in The Progressive Thinker of March 1, 1902, "Sar'gis," quoting the above paragraph said:

"Here in a sentence is the whole matter as to scientific Spiritualism. Science is the knowledge of Nature, its laws or functions. Spirit is nature manifesting in these laws or functions. To test the higher by the lesser is effort misapplied—the reverse of cause and effect. Science can be enlightened and instructed by spirit, but spirit can never be compared by science. And our talkers about the scientific demonstration of Spiritualism are simply talking up a vacuum."

And as an illustration of this position a farther quotation from Mrs. Richmond's address was made as follows:

"So when any medium developed by the unseen life is taken possession of by any set of men or society in order that the facts may be investigated, not from the standpoint of the great human need, but as a butterfly or a bug or any other thing would be investigated, it ceases to fulfill the object for which it was intended."

No one can trace any allusion to any thing here but the Piper case and the society, and in commenting on it this writer refers to "the Hodgsons, Hyslops," etc., "that have so interminably of late darkened opinion by want of knowledge—or candor."

Where does Brother Lockwood find any place here for his interference—which he characterizes as "emanating from a vacuum."

In the same article the writer, referring to Prof. Loeb and his discovery, puts this question, "What is this but Prof. Lockwood's molecular hypothesis, that receives only half-concealed opposition from our leaders?" And then this: "Next we will be berated for stinginess in not pouring out money to endow professorships to teach what Prof. Loeb has discovered, after having kept Lockwood on half-rations for years, teaching the same thing." Is Brother Lockwood prepared to say that these appreciative words are also "from a vacuum?" If they are, then has his science achieved a great feat—filled a vacuum with his fame. More than this—as these occasional contributions in The Progressive Thinker will bear out the statement—there has never an occasion offered that admiration for his teaching has not been manifested.

No apology is made for this admiration, nor does this overflow of epithetic criticism lessen it, and why make Mrs. Richmond a party to it, when the Psychical Research Society was the object of criticism by both speaker and comment upon the address? Is Brother Lockwood the champion of that society—or where is the inspiration for this remarkable "essay?" If science could only teach us the economy or office of the spleen in the human viscera, then indeed might we be able to account for this display of splenetic temper in his generally admirable "essay." Is it not reasonable to say that his attack is from a morbid view of the situation—surely he was in the mind of the writer only in complimentary colors.

But there is another very funny thing in Brother Lockwood's "essay." It is his definition of science. If Professor Lockwood had only looked a little farther he would have found that the same writer who talks from a vacuum in The Progressive Thinker's symposium, February 15, 1902, after stating that to his idea Spiritualism was neither a religion or science, said this:

"The better statement would be that knowledge as to Spiritualism should be pursued after the scientific method. That method seeks facts through evidence and demonstration. When a fact is established it controls the methods of farther research, but ceases to be a subject of debate. It becomes a basis, an element in itself. A scientific fact is rather a misnomer. The scientific method has ascertained fact not made it."

Now, this is after the manner of Lockwood, and the whole article might be open to a suspicious mind that sees what is not before it, as a plagiarism from the "essay," was it not of an earlier date. Perhaps it was a "co-related" impression.

According to the "essay" science is only a method. It says: "Science is a system of inductive and deductive reasoning. It is a formula of demonstration, as applied to the inductive, and of syllogistic reasoning as applied to the deductive; hence it can never be employed as a synonym for knowledge, philosophy or truth, since it is only the method by which knowledge and truth are established. So, then, science is only a method and nothing more. A dog's nose is a method employed to find a fox, a science until it runs up against the fox, but ceases so to be when the fox is caught—that is according to the deductive method—the deductive fox is caught by reasoning on the conditions employed in the other case. But, Professor, your dog would look at you reproachfully, were you to treat his great effort in that way. He has a much better knowledge of his nose than that.

But, remember now the definition that science is only a method. The writer has just examined four leading dictionaries—Webster, Worcester, the Century, and the Encyclopedic dictionary, Cassell & Co., London—and every one of them begins and ends the definition of science as "knowledge." And Herbert Spencer, following the common error, as exposed by the "essay," divides science into classes as (1) Abstract sciences; (2) Abstract concrete sciences; (3) concrete sciences.

It is not the purpose here to enter on any debate with the "essay," and these references are only made as a sort of timid protest against Brother Lockwood being both lexicographer and critic. Science being only a method, of course Prof. Lockwood's method is his science—and with this assumption there cannot in charity be any quarrel—even by a vacuum. It really looks as if our favorite champion of Spiritualism as related to the truths of science has rather shown temper than the composure of philosophy in thus going back into the Piper episode for the opportunity of some latent impulse—and has had to make dictionaries to have his venture hold—its purpose.

Now as to the moral of all this? That it would conduce to harmony if our speakers and writers were to follow the advice of Nora Batchelor. Let the N. S. A. fill its prospectus, but omit censure and scolding of those who cannot understand or grasp infinite intelligence, or fail to reach the heights of its mission.

Let Moses Hull have his way of doing. He represents a great mass of people and is doing much good. So many think from a Bible concept that his work is timely and valuable—but debate never converted anybody—save in the mutual case referred to—and sneering at the ignorance of less fortunate minds is not a good way to induce pupilage to educational effort.

NIGHT.

Softly fades the parting ray
Of the glowing orb of day,
And the flaming streamers rise
To the zenith of the skies.
Dusky eve steals on apace,
Veiling earth in sombre lace;
Hushed the singer's joyous tone,
Night once more sits on the throne.

Silence deep and calm repose
Follow at the daylight's close,
And fair Luna, queen of night,
Floods the earth with mellow light,
And she shows her smiling face
Thro' the fleecy clouds in space,
Brightening the darksome nook,
Where perchance there lurks a spook.

In my room alone I sit,
Noting not how time doth flit,
And I feel a subtle thrill
Creeping o'er me like a chill,
And I sense the presence dear,
Of a lost one drawing near;
Climbing quickly on my knee,
Sits a boy laughing at me.

Do you want the truth to learn
How our spirit friends return?
Would you lift the mystic veil,
Seeking friends you now bewail?
Would you pass the gate ajar,
Where the risen spirits are?
Seek within thyself the key—
God lives in humanity.

JUNE DAYS.

Oh, there's health in the air unfettered with care,
Where the sun warms the deep grassy meadows,
And the odors of roses and dessamines rare
Are borne from sweet cooling shadows.

Oh, the peace of the morn with its jubilant song,
That drops like dew from azure-lit skies,
Where no blight of acute, sorrow or wrong
Can ever darken or rise.

The fairy June month into summer is running,
Thro' the vista of years I can see far away,
When youth like a song in my heart-life was sunning,
In the aisles of a beautiful May.

And a melody sweet ripples with laughter,
Adown the long years of the dead past,
Breathing of love that fills me with rapture,
Faithful and true my memory holds fast.

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

Brief Notes on Various Subjects.

What a most peculiar point of climacteric time we are now passing through. To one who is enough interested to take a bird's-eye view of the weaving of the great loom of events, it is a marvelous web of curious intricacies.

The predictions of the astrologers are in a partial way being fulfilled, so far, indeed, as to cause a creepy feeling of wonder as to what next, and how close it will strike to the place where we stand. Will all or even a greater part of these enlightened ones' prophecies come to pass? Can they tell? Can anybody tell?

Amidst the almost absolute promises of bountiful harvests, we have all the obstructive forces intensifying themselves until the plagues of Ancient Egypt grow insignificant in comparison. As the year grows older, so in an increasing ratio comes the letting loose of whatever the malign planets hold in store for us.

Not satisfied with Nature's diseased condition, her children are doing their best to increase their own discomfort by disturbances of various sorts. On every hand there are strikes and lockouts, with all their attendant commotion.

Never was the world at large in so perturbed a condition as now. The day is set when the authority of Church and State is to place the crown of the English empire on Edward's brow. In the gambling centers, the worshipers of the blind, fickle goddess are betting 100 to 3 there never will be a crowned Edward Seventh. What a commentary on the whole of the affairs—the seething tumult of the world. Is it strange, while dwelling on this unsightly picture, there comes a wonder if to angel eyes our physical conditions resemble the sweltering back to dissolution of dead carcasses, fermenting vitalized organisms, knowing just enough to move squirmingly.

We congratulate ourselves on our acquirements and attainments. We boast of our wealth; of our business ability and of our wisdom. Have we ever stopped to think how it was we are the possessors of such vast wealth? Mother Earth had it all for us, hidden away about the ample folds of her dress. Our soils were fertile, our forests abundant. Beast, fowl and fish swarmed about us, beyond the farthest limit of our needs or desires. The whole range of minerals, noble and common, abounded. We were able to prove up our claim of pre-emption with comparatively little cost of money or life.

The difference between a savage and a civilized nation is in what they have to sell. We have sold to all the world, without stint from the earth's surface—the waters and the fields; and from below the surface. Not only was this the raw material; but we had the gumption to invent and manufacture, saving all profits but the transportation, and often a large share of that. It is not wonderful that we have become a wealthy nation. It would have been far more strange if we had not. We do not say of an heir to millions: "It is queer that he should be rich." We expect one who has thus been favored of fortune to be well-fixed. As a nation, we have amassed nothing, it was all a legacy. We have squandered much. But amidst all the seething tumult of these latter days, we are learning to make the most of the opportunities offered us, on every hand. This is exemplified in the working of our gold mines, where the use of the cyanide process saves almost all the metal for which this coast is famous. At last gold mining and milling is likely to become a careful, intelligent process of manufacture, in which even the economic processes of the immense pork-packing industries may be outdone. We are waiting the next number in the program.

During the last weeks, Oakland, our neighbor city, over the bay, has been indulging in a street fair carnival, for a charitable purpose, under the auspices of the Order of Elks. It was a piece of the Midway Plaisance of the World's Fair, spread out so that the congestion of the latter was relieved.

In no other climate could one of these out-of-door affairs be held. It is understood that the financial success has surpassed expectations. The charity to be benefited thereby is not to be left empty-handed.

Prof. H. A. Streight, whose name and rare gifts are familiar to many of The Progressive Thinker family, has been visiting friends in the city for a short time. His residence is at Mountain View, California. He had some of his paintings with him, for which he is famous.

There is "plenty of sign" that we are up against "Independence Day" and the small boy. Old Sol is becoming more attentive to Mother Earth. The rising hope of the nation has been practicing at long range for his part in the celebration of the day when his fathers "fit and bled and died for their country." Thus far he has succeeded admirably, as some forty casualties, ranging from a maimed finger to the loss of an eye, amply attest. The daily papers suggest the police should confiscate the implements of disturbance, but as yet no action of that kind has been taken. As we write, the detonations that we, in common with the Chinese, so much enjoy(?) startles us from the even-flowing of our thought, and yet it is days to the precincts of the "Great and Glorious Fourth."

THE ORIGIN OF LIFE.

Can Not Drive God Out of Modern Thought.

From whence came life?
From whence came intelligence?

These questions have never been answered with final and satisfactory exactness. Life and intelligence are here in a thousand forms and degrees of development. We see them in the lowly insect, feeble and rudimentary, and in an ascending scale of being we behold their greater manifestation until in man, who is the acme of creation, we see the supreme exhibition of life and intelligence upon earth. But how came they here? What produces them?

One class of thinkers holds that life and intelligence could only have arisen out of antecedent life and intelligence. "Ex nihilo nihil fit," they quote with absolute conviction. And this is so evidently true that no one tries to controvert it. It is as certain as that two and two make four. "Out of nothing nothing comes." Any possible theory or hypothesis which men may put forth is foredoomed to certain destruction the moment it comes into conflict with this axiomatic truth. You cannot get water out of that which is destitute of all moisture. No more can you get life out of that which contains no life, or intelligence out of that which does not possess intelligence. The sleight-of-hand expert may cause some credulous bumpkin to think he took a lot of articles out of a hat which he never put in it, but a thoughtful observer knows he did first place them there at all events. And just so we are sure that the cunning fingers of Nature never produce anything from the depths of her capacious and mysterious pockets that was not stored there against the time.

The doctrine of the spontaneous generation of life does not command the attention of thoughtful persons. The living does not arise out of the non-living now or ever. Back of all living creatures were generations of other living creatures, each of its own species and type particularly. Before the bird another bird from which it derived its being. Before the ox a prior ox. Before the man an antecedent man, and before him another man who also had an ancestor, and so on until we get back to the first man.

Aye, there's the rub! We can account for everything but the first. That First Cause—what is it? God, force, matter, mind, chance, chemical affinity? If only there was no first man, tree or beast to consider, how it would simplify things. We could then say that there was no first cause, either great or small; that all things as they are now, by the simple law of reproduction, had been going on forever. But we cannot so affirm. While a few affirm the absurdity of creation, none dares deny a beginning.

"In the beginning" is not only a Bible word but a scientific statement as well. There was a beginning of things as they now exist. There was a time in the past when no life-forms were on the earth. Not only was there beginning, but ending also. Fossil remains of extinct species of animals abound. They arose out of apparent nothingness and have perished into utter extinction. Whence their origin?

There are two ways of trying to account for the appearance of organized, intelligent life-forms on the earth. The first is the Bible method or creation theory. "In the beginning," and as the cause of it—God. A personal God, the fountain of all life and intelligence, created all things out of nothing or, according to the latest interpretation, formed them out of material already and eternally existing. This view assumes that mind and matter are separate, that matter is dead, and that mind is not the product of matter. Mind was before matter, or at least superior to it, and controls, enters into and energizes it. So a great First Cause, a God of infinite power, reason and benevolence is postulated, a Spirit, wholly unlike and superior to matter, who existed eternally, having neither beginning nor ending. "Pneuma ho Theos," said Jesus. Spirit is God. And this is the origin of life and intelligence on earth. The Creator, Spirit, Infinite Intelligence, formed matter into the various shapes and conditions that organized matter has ever presented, and "breathed" or infilled them with life and differing degrees of intelligence.

This is the easy way to account for the existence of all things. More than that it is reasonable. True, no man can prove there is a God. It is only a hypothesis. Rousseau said: "If there was no God men would have to invent one." A noted physicist said: "It is easier to believe in a God than to disbelieve." Without a doubt it is the easy, natural and logical method to account for the existence of every form of life and intelligence on the globe by asserting the prior, or antecedent, existence of a powerful, living, personal and intelligent Agent, or Being, from whom they derived the endowment of life and intellect. But this fact, if it is a fact, cannot be demonstrated. It is simply a logical conclusion. It is a necessary inference within the domain of abstract reasoning. It is a metaphysical certainty.

But if the existence of God can never be demonstrated neither can his non-existence be proven, or even made probable. Denials can be offered, an almost endless number of more or less ingenious criticisms upon the methods of this supposed God can be paraded, pointing out alleged mistakes, brutalities and shortcomings. But what then? They have not taken God, or the necessity for Him, away. Grant every indictment against the management of nature, as charged against God by the atheist, to be true, yet the cardinal demand of the reason for a God remains insistent and unanswered.

We demand a cause for things: if not a Great Cause, at least a cause great enough to account for the effects we behold all around us. We refuse to put common sense in leash and stultify reason by saying that life and intelligence are effects, the cause of which was nothing. A machine may not be perfect by any means, but that does not prove that it had no maker. And herein lies the mistake of the average atheist. He points out the imperfections of nature, such as cyclones, volcanic disasters, poisonous reptiles, famine, pestilence and the like, and then says: "Behold how imperfect is this great machine! Therefore it had no maker. Ergo; there is no God." As a matter of fact he does not answer the call of reason for a cause for things, but eases his soul of sundry and various objections to the existing order of things. And it is a matter of absolutely no importance whatever whether his objections are well taken or not. We are not considering the perfection or imperfection of things, but the origin, beginning or cause of them. Not whether the machine is perfect but if it had a maker. Let atheists cease pointing out real or apparent imperfections and tragedies of nature, and grapple the main issue. Consider the origin, not the perfection, of organized existence.

Prof. J. S. Loveland's essay in The Progressive Thinker No. 654 was the best thing in its line published in many a day. He demolished that mathematical argument (which was not an argument) completely. But for reasons already given, he did not touch the real problem at all. No man can prove there is a God. But, also, no amount of wailing over the hardness of Nature can render His existence improbable or drive Him out of modern thought.

THE INNER LIFE IS THE REAL.

There's a life within which is ever new,
And a love which can never die!
A hope and a faith ever strong and true,
Pointing up to a home on high;
Where the sorrowful scenes of earth are no more,
And the soul is enraptured with bliss—
Where the glories of life on that yonder shore,
Far excel all the grandeur of this.

This sweet inner hope is the light of my soul,
Leading upward to themes all divine,
Where the angelic choirs of heaven unroll
True harmonies sweet and sublime.
This hope and this faith I will trust to the last,
Though knowledge may never be mine;
For they brighten my way when clouds overcast
This "valley of tears" here in time.

To think of the life on that evergreen shore,
Is to me the highest of themes;
From sadness and sorrow and shadows of earth,
My soul it most surely redeems.
To think of my friends who have gone on before—
That soon I shall meet with them there,
Makes lighter my spirit and gives it new strength
Life's trials and burdens to bear.

THE SUNSET GATES.

I have often thought when sunset
Burned on the mountain crest,
And its strange, unearthly glory
Kindled along the west,
In a vision of wonderful splendor,
That the gates of heaven were ajar,
And thro' them I caught faint glimpses
Of the land where our loved ones are.

Behold! but is it but fancy?
The sunset gates swing wide,
And I see through their parted portals
The hills of the heaven side—
The hills that are crowned with sunshine
Of a day that never ends,
In a country where no grave is
And no one mourns lost friends.

I fancy I catch thro' the gateway
A glimpse of the golden street,
And an echo of wonderful music,
Mystic, low and sweet,
Comes on the winds of twilight,
From the country far away,
Where the dear remembered voices
Sing in God's choir to-day.

And see!—but a shadow hides it!
I thought that I saw a hand
That beckoned me to come over
To the beautiful summer land.
Oh, loved of mine, whom I miss so,
Are you there at the sunset gate,
To watch for me down the pathway
That leads home, soon or late?

The angels of dusk are closing
The gates to my longing eyes,
And no longer I see the city
On the hills of Paradise,
But love, like the soul, is deathless,
And some day—God knows when!
I shall pass through the sunset gateway
And find my own again.

Having put what money they had and all their time and strength into this work, they have carried on the work for years, at a heavy expense, without soliciting a dollar, relying entirely on the prayer of faith to furnish the necessary means.

WOMEN AND CHILDREN THERE.

Mr. Richards was asked recently to tell what the expenses of the Beulah Home were, how he raised the money to meet them, how often, if ever, his resources failed him and how he justified his method of living by faith, and he said:

"There are at present fifty-six women and children in the Beulah Home who look to me under God for food and shelter and other support. The expenses of the work amount to $300 a month, of which $105 is for rent. To secure this amount of money we rely entirely on the promises of God pleaded before him in prayer and faith. We have not solicited a dollar for this work for the last four years, not even by disclosing our necessities when our supplies were exhausted. Sometimes God puts it into the hearts of other people to solicit for the Home, but it is never by our request or manipulation.

"I suppose it is no departure from this rule for me to tell you in a general way how close we sail to the wind and how constantly we have to look to God for deliverance. Our large family ate up at supper this evening every mouthful of food we had except a few potatoes, and all the money I have in the world is $3.50. At this moment I have not the slightest idea where I shall ever get another dollar or another meal. Now, this situation is chronic with us, except that it is often much more trying, and yet we have never missed a meal and our peace of mind is not often disturbed.

SEASONS OF DARKNESS APPEAR.

"We experience, sometimes, however, seasons of the greatest darkness, depression and anxiety. Every now and then I am like a man who wakes out of a trance, and everything I have been doing looks absurd and ruinous. I wonder how I could ever have assumed such responsibilities. I reproach myself for having led others into a foolish position. My work looks like a failure. I feel as if I had made a fool of myself, and I can hardly look anybody in the face. At such times I am likely to go over to the park and find a retired place and have a good cry.

"But even at times like this I never think of asking any human being for help. I am only driven to importunate and agonizing prayer, in which our entire household participates. The information is passed around in the home that we are in great straits, and immediately everybody, including the inmates, goes to praying. As for me and my wife, we sometimes lie down on our faces before God for hours.

"Now, some people, of course, will say that all this shows that God does not take care of us, but I put the opposite construction on it. If God gave us $3,600 May 1 every year to do our work with during the ensuing twelve months it would be the spiritual ruin of us. We would have so few transactions with our Heavenly Father that we would retain no sense of his providence, and we would cease to depend on him or love him. It is absolutely necessary to a life of faith that we should receive day by day our daily bread, as the Israelites received the manna.

DIVINE WAY OF EXCITING FAITH.

"As to our periodic experiences of alarm and mental agony, they are God's way of arousing us from incipient stupor and giving us a new spiritual impetus. After our affairs have gone on smoothly for some time the tendency is to produce coldness and to lessen our sense of dependence. If this tendency were allowed to go on unchecked we should ultimately lose every particle of faith, love and joy in the work. But God arouses us out of that state by withdrawing his help until we get alarmed and are forced to cry out for deliverance.

"Of course, these seasons of humiliation and distress would be a sorry business but for the results. But in every case deliverance comes and our necessities are met in ways so peculiar that we cannot fail to see God's hand in them, and so delightful in character that we are bound to praise his grace. When the smoke of the battle is all over we find that every want has been provided for, that our alarm was all the result of a want of faith and that even this want of faith has cured itself automatically.

"It would be impossible to tell you how God generally sends the money, because he does not send 'generally' in any one way. It comes in an endless variety of ways, nearly all of them unforseen. But by the way of illustration I may tell you of one or two of our deliverances.

"On one occasion, when our patience had been tried until it was almost exhausted and we had made up our minds to abandon the work, I received a telegram informing me that a suit of mine that had been pending in the Supreme Court of Nebraska for many years had been decided and that I might draw my check for $1,000. It was a perfect surprise to me and my faith and determination were immediately renewed. I put every cent of the money into the work and went on trusting God for running expenses as before.

CAME FROM NEBRASKA FOR PRAYER.

"Another time we were in such straits that at breakfast I had to buy bread from the baker on credit. That was something of a breakdown for us, because a life of faith is not consistent with running in debt. On this occasion I went in debt for our breakfast, but I had the faith to promise the baker that I would pay him before noon. Well, by the time breakfast was eaten I got a message from a man that I used to know out West to meet him at the Great Northern Hotel. I went down, and what do you suppose he wanted? He said he had prospered in business, but that he was in great spiritual darkness and that he had come all the way to Chicago to get me to pray for him. So we went to a room in the hotel and had a season of prayer, and when we were about to separate he asked me casually how I was getting on in my work. I told him the Lord was taking care of us and he handed me $40.

"So you see we live by what must appear to faithless eyes a series of hairbreadth escapes. But we know by long experience that we have not been in any danger at all. We know that God will never forsake us and that he would put the angels on half rations before he would let the Home suffer.

"Now, I know very well that many Christian people do not approve of my way of doing Christian work. They consider that it is sheer presumption to pray to God for money and not use the natural means to get it, and the way to get it, they say, is to solicit it. They think we ought to get the churches interested, form a society with an executive board, get a charter, send out circulars, take up collections and make personal appeals to people of means. They consider that we should in this way endeavor to answer our own prayers.

"Well, the unanswerable objection to that program is that we have given it a faithful trial and it turned out an utter failure. But let me tell you more particularly some of the disadvantages of looking to man for support instead of trusting in God. In the first place, when people who are doing God's work solicit funds they and their work forfeit the good will and respect of the public. They are sneered at as beggars, people dodge and run when they see them coming and curse them when they have gone. Nearly all the people they approach are utterly indifferent to the cause and they immediately begin to justify their refusal to contribute by slandering the work and the people who are doing it. Those who give anything give it reluctantly and lay it up as a grudge against the person who solicited it. If I were to follow this plan for three years and did not starve in the meanwhile everybody would be remarking that the Home was a money-making fraud and that I was a cheat and an impostor. That is the reputation of dozens of Christian enterprises in this city.

"In the second place, a natural result of all this unpopularity the people who conduct such a work lose their self-respect. They are turned down, snubbed and insulted until they really begin to think they deserve it and that they are actually the frauds the people accuse them of being. I have been through all this until I could hardly look my wife in the face and I have made up my mind that it is not according to the will of God.

GIVEN FROM LOVING MOTIVES.

"Then, again, when money is given to a work like ours without being solicited it is given from loving motives and is worth ten times as much given under any sort of pressure. When money is given to us from love it makes us love the giver and love God, who inclined him to give, and love each other, because God loves us. The whole Home is filled with the fragrance of faith and love, and it is only under such circumstances that our work can prosper at all, for it is principally a work for the spiritual good of the inmates.

"I might add that if I were to depend on soliciting money for our Home I would have neither time nor heart to do anything else. I would have to give up all administrative work and all spiritual work. I would be so worn out physically and so depressed mentally that I could not make any use of the money after I had got it. So I made up my mind long ago that if he would not support it I would abandon it. Moreover, I know I did right, because I have been blessed and prospered ever since."

The Beulah Home is a refuge for a class of young women who are regarded as having lost forever their respectability and for whom society believes there is no hope. What is somewhat surprising the inmates come not from the haunts of vice in the city, but almost entirely from quiet homes in the small places within 100 miles of Chicago.

These poor creatures are the laughing stock of heartless people, and many Christian people consider all the time and money devoted to them as thrown away. But Mr. Richards considers that many of them are just as pure and good as any women in the world and are simply the heart-broken victims of vile people. The life history of some of them would melt a heart of stone. They are in no sense hopeless characters, even if the world does turn its back on them. Under the Christian influence of Beulah Home they gather new courage for the unequal battle of life, and, as Mr. Richards says, by the blessing of God 80 per cent of them become and remain happy women.

Many of the 800 who have passed through the Home are now earning an honest living as servants, some have returned to their homes and many are happily married. They all maintain a correspondence with the Home and still draw from it much of the inspiration that enables them to make their way in the world.

Oliver H. Richards was born and brought up near Columbus City, Ind., and is 44 years old. In religion he is a member of the United Brethren. He passed most of his business life in Nebraska, where he embarked in the building business and later in the undertaking business. After making a considerable fortune he lost it all, as he believes, because he had backslidden in his religious life. He has lived in Chicago since the World's Fair in 1893. He was engaged in several secular and semi-religious callings here until six years ago, when he was by the force of circumstances led into the work of caring for these women.

At first he took them into his own home. Afterward he rented buildings for this purpose alone, first at 474 Fullerton avenue, then at 36 Grant place and finally at 963 North Clark street. Subsequently the premises at 961 were added to the Home. These buildings bear no sign to indicate what they are used for. One reason for this is that Mr. Richards and his work have been persecuted and driven away from two or three other localities. Even Christian people have given him considerable trouble and from the churches he claims he has received more criticisms than dollars. The above facts from the Chicago Chronicle make interesting and impressive reading. We now give

THE SPIRITUALISTIC INTERPRETATION.

There is a large and influential class of spirits who take especial pleasure in answering "prayers to God" when they are made exclusively for some unselfish purpose.

They do not know absolutely that any God hears these prayers, and it is enough for them to know that THEY alone hear them, and they strive with great force and perseverance to bring about the results desired.

It is a glorious work—angelic in the highest degree—to make an effort to redeem young girls who have made missteps in life through the influence of artful villains. They are usually buds of great promise; their fervent love giving way to the encroachments of lustful passions on the part of heartless, scheming young men, who promise everything, only to prove false.

The Progressive Thinker is greatly interested in humanitarian work, under whatever religious cloak it may parade.

Mr. Richards may be misled in attributing his success to the kindly influence of a God, when ministering spirits alone answer his prayers as far as possible, by influencing the impressible to assist him; yet that fact makes but little difference so long as the results desired are achieved.

Spiritualistic influences permeate all the churches, more or less, and while exalted spirits deplore the prevalent existence of erroneous beliefs, they respond as far as in their power to prayers that have an unselfish object in view.

It is being recognized among thinkers that all prayers are answered—if answered at all—by those who were once mortals, and that often great good is accomplished. If God answered all prayers—being all-powerful—there would be no failures; but as they are answered, if at all, by those whose powers and influence are limited, there will be occasionally great failures, hence to rely on prayers as an all-potent savior is exceedingly foolish. They failed Dowie in the supreme moment when his lovely daughter was severely burned; they fail everyone where the obstacle is too great to be overcome.

The power to answer prayer has its limits, therefore all earthly means should be employed to assist the angel visitants to answer them. It is idiocy—worse than blasphemy—to pray as Dowie does to relieve human suffering without resorting to all earthly agencies to assist the angels in answering the prayer. Dowie, erratic, and at times an imbecile in his methods, is on the verge of a grand truth, with which God has nothing whatever to do, angel visitants answering his prayers as far as possible, and when they fail it is because too much is asked.

Spiritualists, however radical they may be, should be extremely tolerant of those who engage in prayer. The prayer may be addressed to a God who has never had an existence, and it may be actuated by a distorted faith and a preposterous creed, yet when uttered unselfishly, it is sure to touch some angelic heart, who will try faithfully to answer it.

Spiritualists should feel extremely kind towards those who are in a measure misguided, and yet who are sincere in their beliefs in reference to the future world. Environments, heredity, early education, etc., have evolved them, made them what they are, and only by slow degrees will they be able to hear the whole truth.

It is humanitarian work that counts, wherever it is brought into requisition, whether with a creed, or without a creed; whether in the church, the sacred shrine at Lourdes, or at a spiritual seance or meeting, or at a place where all are bowed in prayer. The bread of charity that comes from the white hands of a nun, is as sweet to the hungry, as that given by some pure devoted Spiritualist. Encouraging words sound as beautifully when uttered by a creed-bound, as when expressed by one who has escaped the tethers of the church. The sincere, enthusiastic, honest, Salvation worker, whose creed is distorted and full of errors, but who wades into the filth of the slums to redeem from want and degradation the unfortunate, is nearer God—if one—is nearer to the angels of heaven—ministering spirits—than the Spiritualist who is ever seeking a test—never satisfied—and whose thoughts have no kinship to humanitarian work. To be a Spiritualist with a correct system of belief, never elevated a person unless supplemented with exalted humanitarian thoughts that are transformed into deeds so far as possible. We had a thousand times rather belong to the Salvation Army with a distorted creed, engaged in works of benevolence—the broadest kind of charity—than be a Spiritualist with the grandest truths in the world as a superstructure, and yet be void of all kindly deeds for the betterment of the human race.

Spiritualists, you can stand at the front if you so desire. You possess the grandest of all truths; the golden sheafs of the spiritualistic harvest are yours. You can control the destinies of the world, if you will only supplement your knowledge with humanitarian work. Otherwise you sink below in spirituality the creed-bound Salvation Army workers who have so nobly invaded the slums of our large cities, and who worship an imaginary God and a burlesque of a Devil.

Here we have an example, as vividly portrayed by Rev. Thomas B. Gregory, in the Chicago American, of a minister of the gospel, Rev. F. W. Millar, pastor of the Universalist Ryder Memorial Church, Sixty-fifth street, this city. He gives himself to the entire community, regardless of the political or religious complexion of those who may stand in need of his services, and from morning until night, through winter's cold and summer's heat, he is ever busy in some sort of noble work.

Twice each Sunday Mr. Millar is in his pulpit, with the broad, human, sympathetic word which appeals to the heart and makes it tenderer and better and happier.

No creed or denomination has a mortgage on this man. He does not know the meaning of the word sectarian.

He has his own views of things, to be sure, and to those views he is ever faithful; but his heart is so large and sunny and hospitable he makes no fight with the man who differs from him.

There is much in common between all men, and upon that Mr. Millar lays the grand emphasis.

But it is not alone in the pulpit that Dr. Millar exerts his kindly powers. The influence of his preaching is large, but larger is the influence of his practice in the community.

He is a practical philanthropist. He believes that while preaching is good, work is better, and from the pulpit he goes regularly forth to apply his precepts to the facts of life.

Many poor, many sick, many sorrowful ones in Woodlawn have been made glad by this man's goodness.

He knows pretty nearly every man in Woodlawn who has an old coat that he does not want, pretty nearly every woman who has an old dress for which she has no further use, and these are all gathered up and placed where they will do some good.

Is some poor family in want? Mr. Millar knows its number and the want is somehow supplied. Is some poor widow hard pressed by the loan sharks? Mr. Millar knows about it and goes to her rescue.

Is some mother with her little ones about to be turned into the street because she cannot pay the rent? Mr. Millar is on hand to see about it, and somehow or other the difficulty is bridged over.

While as yet the Bureau of Associated Charities was little more than a dream Dr. Millar had his charitable work in Woodlawn well organized and actively engaged.

Mr. Millar's sermon on a late Sunday morning was a fair sample of the spirit that is in him and of the work he is trying to do. The subject of the sermon was "The Heroic Life."

"The heroic life," said the preacher, "is the loving life, the life that finds its glory in doing good. The real hero is not the one who founds an empire and establishes a splendid dynasty, but he who makes the world brighter, cleaner, nobler, happier. Jesus was a greater hero than Caesar; John Howard than Napoleon; Jane Addams than Queen Semiramis.

"Kingdoms and dynasties pass away; crowns crumble, and the glory of courts and cabinets is but a summer cloud; but love and that which love does is eternal."

Spiritualists, heed the lesson hereby imparted, and live for others as well as self.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM.

It Embraces Whatever Is Worthy in Every System.

NUMBER NINE.

The Devil.

Theologians once debated "how many devils could dance at one time on the point of a cambric needle." Seeing that all these monsters—hobgoblins, satyrs, elementaries, etc., are subjective creations, like "the beast with seven heads and ten horns," or the one with "a sword proceeding out of his tail," there is plenty room on a needle's point for them all. They are as real as the centaur or the nightmare. There was a time when pedagogues believed a child could learn nothing without frequent birchings. So there was a time when theologians supposed God or the angels could do nothing with a human brain unless it were paralyzed with fear. "There was war in heaven and the devil was cast out." He has no place as a personality in the philosophy of Spiritualism.

However there are spirits who are unfit to be guides or controls or associates of anybody, and there are some who may be unfit to associate with one and well fitted to "control" others because of difference in temperament, etc. Broadly speaking and without condemning one or the other, close association with uncongenial natures on earth produces misery. Much more does intimacy with uncongenial spirits. Those who love you most by the unalterable laws of nature are entitled to the greatest intimacy with you, and if God is love, those who love you are from God.

But because a spirit is not in close sympathy with you is no proof of that spirit's diabolical nature. It is "sadly amusing" to hear mediums say "Mrs. Jones' spirits are bad;" "my spirits are," etc., as if one were talking of a basket of eggs. You have heard children boast, "My mamma is the bestest mamma." In children and simple folk this is pleasing, but in those who assume judicial and comprehensive powers, who are no longer babes, it is not pleasant. No man or sect has a corner on exalted spirits. Two thousand years ago a Christian advised to "try the spirits." A few years ago another Christian wrote

"And the demons of our sires become
The Gods that we adore."

Poetic license, yet it is very true that our standard of a worthy character has changed. There has come out of the only "bottomless pit" of a superstitious imagination the idea that exalted spirits are cold, severe, terrifying—that they are habitually lugubrious or go strutting about like a cheap tragedian and trying to imitate Jove and with thunder paralyze the worshiper. Almost the opposite is true. On earth or in the skies the unaffected as well as most affectionate are the exalted. Are they gentle? Are they unpretentious? Are they responsive? Are they tolerant? Do they come in a fraternal spirit and instead of posing as supernatural beings, say like the angel John fell down to worship: "See thou do it not, I am of thy brethren."

Exalted spirits on occasion laugh, joke, dance and sing. Their exaltation depends on their gentleness, charity, etc., and no man or spirit who has climbed to distinction on any other qualities but will go down again. Nor is there a better description of the heavenly spirit than that of Kipling on Ballestier:

"Scarce had he need to cast his pride,
Or slough the dross of earth;
E'en as he trod that day to God, so walked he from his birth,
In simpleness and gentleness and honor and clean mirth."

NUMBER TEN.

Hell.

Once the "godly man" put in one hour a day preparing a heaven for his own tribe, and the rest of the day digging hells for every other tribe. The Spiritualist is a little timid about damning any one. From his spirit guides he finds little encouragement to follow that habit. While there is evidence to personal admissions of unhappiness beyond the grave, there also comes testimony equally strong of the happiness of those whom conventional ideas of God, of religion, of duty, of justice, of morality would relegate to an abode of misery. But we do know principles to guide human conduct, a violation of which results in misery in any world, only more sudden and poignant in the spirit worlds. A great deal of the sorrow in any sphere is from a violation of the true law of social intercourse. We are forced into intimacy long with uncongenial fellows, and many people who are unhappy only need freedom and encouragement to associate with those appointed by nature. Further on I will more fully explain.

Generally it is true that "whoso diggeth a pit shall fall therein." "With what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged" is scientific. According to well known laws of psychology one who is exacting with another must become tyrannical with himself. There is a psychological condition induced by severely judging your fellows, when the inevitable time comes (and this is the Day of Judgment to be feared) to sit in judgment on your own life will compel you to be as tyrannous with yourself as you have been in the days of your pride with a fellow man or woman. Do you think you are going to be severe and exacting with other men and go scot free yourself? This habit will also attract to you spirits who will exact from you and lord it over you as you have done with others. And if a certain kind who love to sit in judgment in the "I am holier than thou" attitude, because your life is not after his dictation, threateningly quotes "as a man soweth, that also shall he reap," ask him what harvest in the Elysian Fields awaits the sickle of one who in this world sowed gentleness, tolerance, charity.

I suppose no sect to-day teaches the existence of the hell of literal fire and brimstone, but the trouble is that in relinquishing that hell they also relinquished the idea of any real substantial heaven—any actual place where angels dwell. Now the spirit world is a place—a locality—and when people accepting the view that the kingdom of heaven is within you renounced the idea of its being without you or depending on external conditions, they acted the baby who, offered an apple and an orange, cannot entertain the idea of holding to both, but drops the one to grasp the other, and as the church dropped something they must pick up again. One idea is not contradictory of but supplementary of the other. Heaven is within but also without, as is hell. In other words, the sensible external conditions of your life must correspond with and be adapted to sustain and reflect the heavenly condition within. The objective must harmonize with the subjective. If not it is hell in this or any other world. Birds of Paradise do not flourish in Siberia.

NUMBER ELEVEN.

Prayer.

To pray means primarily to ask aid—something, anything from another. We pray daily to each other, and there is nothing unreasonable, superstitious or unnatural in praying to the Unseen if they can understand and render assistance; and the universal testimony of Spiritualism is that

"More things are wrought by prayer
Than this world dreams of."

The Oriental slave approaches the royal presence in abasement, groveling on his knees or crawling on his belly like the slave he is, and the savage monarch is flattered and perhaps moved to grant a favor. The idea has persisted in theology from the "dark backward and abysm of time," that a potentate of the skies is another such regal character who requires the degradation of his petitioner. Spiritualism denies it and so far as prayer consists in hypocritical protestations of unworth, the repetition of cant phrases, or the assumption of unnatural postures, renounces it. But knowing that the ability to respond depends on favorable conditions, while setting no narrow or arbitrary limits to the power of angel hosts to prepare those conditions we try to pray intelligently, something perhaps after the manner of the parson who refused to pray for rain until the wind was in the south.

NUMBER TWELVE.

Customs and Laws.

When Jesus was arraigned for violating the Mosaic codes or "moral law," the particular point at issue being at that time the fourth commandment, his defense was not that he was himself alone superior to and independent of laws that should bind all other men. His defense was of humanity—"the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath." This is the position of Spiritualism regarding not only the Sabbath but any and every institution ever established. When they cease to further human welfare and produce satisfactory results, as in general contentment, it is time for man to assert his superiority and have them altered or amended. This applies, as in other things, to religious ceremonies.

"These indeed seem
For they are actions that a man may play."

But many of them have been wisely instituted to carry spiritual suggestions to darkened minds and to help open the way for light from above by agreeably acting on the emotional nature; for as a blow of the hammer on hot iron produces more effect than fifty blows on cold metal so is development more rapid with a person whose emotional nature is stirred.

Consider now the institution of baptism which was common to other religions than the Christian. There was the suggestion of living a purer life and underneath all lay the suggestion of the importance of washing away filth, and in development the importance of bodily cleanliness is very important. "Cleanliness is next to godliness."

THE SOUL AND ITS DESTINY.

Oh, who can measure the infinite sea
That surrounds the soul and its destiny,
Or behold with a vision clear,
While earthly pleasures dazzle the sight,
And care and sorrow obscure the light
That flows from the heavenly sphere?

We know, we feel, that the hour will come,
When we shall gather our loved ones home—
At home in the better land.
But whether the spirit, freed from care,
Flits swiftly away to the mansions fair,
We never shall understand

Till our listening ears hear the voices sweet,
That are calling us ever; and willing feet
O'er the "rainbow bridge" have trod,
Till we soar above all time and space,
And stand with the angels face to face,
Shall we see and know of God.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

CAN MAN READ THE FUTURE?

Maurice Maeterlinck Writes of His Psychological Experiments.

Maurice Maeterlinck, the great Belgian philosopher-poet, has just taken advanced ground as a believer in man's ability to read the future with the same certainty that he views the past.

In a series of remarkable investigations recently made in Paris he has proven, to his own satisfaction at least, that there is no scientific reason why the gift of prophecy should be denied to man. A twist to a brain cell, a bunch of additional nerves, the mastery of some neglected faculty of reason, and the miracle is accomplished.

Appended is Maeterlinck's own story of his researches:

Why not look into the future?

BY MAURICE MAETERLINCK.

It is but a natural impulse which for centuries has prompted man to turn the waves of light into the future.

There have always been prophets, soothsayers and magicians who claimed the gift, and frauds or not, normal or abnormal, many of them left their impress. History records their sayings to this day.

Nowadays, fortune-telling is practiced only by the vulgar and despised; it appeals only to the ignorant and easily led. Childish or ridiculous means are employed to attain problematic ends, yet it is not wholly without merit, as my own experience shows.

I started on my tour of discoveries at a time when a project, that had got beyond my control, was in suspense. While unable to influence its outcome in any manner or form, I felt that its failure or success would forever decide my fortunes. Hence, I had some pointed questions to ask.

I began by calling on those miserable astrologers and sibyls, who imagine that they can read your future in a set of dirty playing cards, at the bottom of an unwashed coffee pot or in the white of an egg dissolved in water. When I got through with these charlatans I went to the most famous somnambulist Paris boasts.

This woman claims to become, under hypnotic influence, the incarnation of a certain little girl, whom she calls Julia.

We sat opposite each other, a broad table between us, and she asked me to talk to Julia, "a child of 7 or 8." Then her countenance changed; her eyes and hands, her whole body went into convulsions, her hair came down, and she was another. Mind, this happened in plain view of me. No screens, false lights, or other hocus-pocus.

During the period of reincarnation, lasting several seconds, Madame was not pleasant to look upon; when it was over her face had the naive and innocent aspect of early girlhood. And now a sharp, clear, girlish voice, emanating from that 250 pounds of avoirdupois, asked in a hesitating, stuttering way:

"What do you want? Are you in trouble? Did you come on your own account or for a friend?"

After answering these questions, I concentrated my thoughts on the matter in hand, on the different actors in the drama that meant so much to me. And after some preliminary remarks, Julia actually entered into these, my thoughts, read them, not without apparent difficulty, though—as one reads the pages of a book covered over by a layer of tissue paper. She gave the scene of action and mentioned the principal parties, characterizing each in a few words, that, while naive, hit the mark—all this without assistance on my part, without a hint even by word of mouth or sign.

"Very well, Julia," I said, "you seem to be as well up in the case as I, but I desire to know more. Please tell me, if you can, how it will all end?"

"That's hard to say, Monsieur."

"Shall I win?" I insisted.

Julia thought a while. "You will be satisfied with the outcome," she said, after a pause. "Don't be afraid of the ultimate results."

"But my principal enemy—will he give in?"

"He won't stand much longer in your way. He is ill and his days are numbered."

"You are mistaken, Julia; he is sound as a fish. I saw him day before yesterday, the picture of health."

Julia (insisting): "I can't help what you saw; that gentleman is doomed. He won't live long."

"How do you account for that, Julia?"

"I see blood all around him; he is marked, I assure you."

"You don't mean to say that he will die in a duel?"

Julia: "No, there will be no duel."

"He will die of accident, then, or by the hand of one of his victims; vengeance will cut him down."

Julia: "Nothing of the kind. He will die, I say—that's all. Now, don't ask me further, please. Let me go. I'm so tired."

"Not until you say——"

The somnambule moved uneasily in her chair. "I can't say more. Pray let me go. I told all I know."

Convulsions again shook the sibyl, and as the childish voice ceased to speak, the countenance of the "fat, fair and forty" gradually reappeared before my puzzled eyes, while madame seemed to awaken from a deep sleep. It's hardly necessary for me to say that this was our first meeting, that the medium knew me neither by name or reputation, and, likewise, knew nothing of my difficulties or of the parties in the case she analyzed.

Next I sent to Julia two persons whom I have every reason to esteem for their good sense and honesty. Both, too, were like myself, anxious to look into their future, and only fate seemed capable of answering the questions that agitated their minds.

My friend Smith asked Julia about the illness of a near relative. She foretold his early death and hit it right, though at the moment when the prophecy was made the person's illness had taken a turn for the better.

Miller asked her about a case before the court. He got a rather undecisive answer, but the prophetess gave him, unasked, a piece of information that helped him immensely in his legal troubles. She told him where a certain document, needed in the case, could be found. Miller had put it there himself, but had forgotten about it.

As to my own affair, Julia's prophecy came true in part at least. The matter was settled to my entire satisfaction. However, though a very sick man, my opponent is still alive. May fate spare him.

Julia undoubtedly read in my soul, and in those of the friends I sent her. She read their thoughts and sentiments, old and new, among them some forgotten ones.

It would seem to the shallow that Julia knew more about my affairs than I. That is a mistake. Her prophecy echoed, in reality, no more than my own hopes and aspirations. And who knows but that she gauged my innermost wishes correctly in predicting the death of my enemy? Doubtless the desire for his undoing was one of those contemptible thoughts which man is loth to express or own up to, but it was there with the rest, and she read it off.

If this death had occurred, if my enemy had passed away without apparent reason, for no outward cause—illness, accident or crime—then I would believe in prophecy. But I, not Julia, would have been the prophet, for Julia was but the medium. It would have been my instinct that foresaw the event so intimately connected with my fate; the sibyl merely interpreted my own particular intuition.

Now, to the other cases.

Smith, who was told that his relative would die, probably knew in his heart of hearts that the man was doomed; knew it despite the encouraging words of the physician.

This conviction, be it natural or otherwise, he tried to down because he wished his relative to live, but the somnambule discovered it in a bunch of false hopes held out for her inspection.

Miller, by Julia's aid, recovered a precious document. Second-sight, or memory, that is the question. My friend scouts the memory idea. He thought the thing had been stolen and secretly had blamed one of his employes for the theft.

Yet it is possible that same brain cell made a note of it, when he put the document in a certain place, while his memory, busy with other things, did not. The somnambule discovered this hidden writing and drew it forth, to the utmost astonishment of its human depositary.—Philadelphia American.

THE PSYCHIC INTUITION.

As Beautifully Portrayed by Nellie Steadman Cox.

"Is there anything whereof it may be said, See, this is new? It hath been already of old time, which was before us."

This wise son of David had knowledge of the influence of music over the conscious-stricken souls. He knew with exquisite sensibility, the telepathic sympathy connecting kindred minds, feeling and putting into use his sixth sense—the unseen force or energy called in the science of to-day, auto-suggestion, or the hypnotic influence. That such an influence permeates space is indisputable. That certain individuals alone possess attractiveness susceptible to this intuition is a question as yet unsolved, but it is now a fact well authenticated that whether it be a gift of God, or an acquired power, the possessor is well qualified to use the thesis in therapeutics and by its aid to restore health to suffering humanity. As a child I was set apart from the kingdom of little people, a dreamer of strange dreams and stranger visions. As a girl I was far removed from the pleasant paths of life, and now as a woman, I walk in the flesh amid the things of earth, but in the spirit live far beyond its ken.

The shadows early fell across my way with storm and tempest. Those who were nearest and dearest to me were carried away by poverty and death, which left me stranded, a wreck upon the shore of time. Broken in spirit; crushed by loss of physical health, but with that determined pertinacity which clings to those dying of consumption, I held on to the one thought of conscious personality as did Job who reasoned with God believing that sickness is a creature of reality, which could be caught and strangled as a man if one but possess the power and the courage to attempt the feat. The physician came to my rescue and saved me from the asylum. He said that I was tired, which was true, and yet my nerves were on such a tension that the thought reflux had never once centered in the brain cell. He suggested that I needed sleep and immediately I yawned, folding my arms and longing to rest in sleep. He bade me close my eyes, and in obeying I entered the chamber of compassionate slumber feeling an entity of purpose in every nerve fibre as one can feel the snow crisping upder foot upon a winter's day.

A veil of exquisite texture white as snow and tangible to the touch enveloped me completely, while a sensation of supreme rest fell upon my vision as a garment of soft and beautiful light. Something held me back by force of love, which alone is God, from the tree of life growing in Paradise, when I could have reached out my hands and plucked the fruit, so near it seemed, and yet I was not dead! When my eyes were again opened to scenes of earth my whole being was renewed physically, the nerve sensitiveness had disappeared and I was mentally refreshed. Rest and Peace, blessed words, when we fully understand their final meaning!—Words and Works.

Some Reflections.

How strange it all seems, this diversity of opinions among investigators. No end to quibbling and theorizing! Many who are well informed and highly educated soon lose their hold, doubt and quibble on the best of demonstrations from the other side. Some want this and some want that. Some desire a Spiritual Bible, and some cling to the old orthodox ways and its Bible. Some speculate, theorize, and imagine that when we go hence we will eternally float around in space like little red rubber balloons, spirit portraits and the like, notwithstanding. If they must have a new Bible, why not adopt "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands?" That book, if carefully read and studied would be of more real benefit to the human family than all the orthodox Bibles in existence. There might be added to this new Bible, with good effect, the letters of Spirit Petersilea and those of Spirit William Denton. With this new Bible in hand, every one can make their own selection as to their future condition, and then live and work to that end. We are thinking that if more of our people were reading and studying this new Bible, there would not be so much diversity, bickerings and backbiting in our ranks as we see now. WM. SCHEIH.

RELIGION'S ADVANCEMENT

Straws Which Indicate the Direction of the Wind That Is Blowing Christianity Forward.

Here are a few clippings from a Monday morning daily which will give the readers of The Progressive Thinker, who are not also readers of the Chicago dailies, some idea of the present trend of the pulpits to-day. The first is from a sermon by Prof. Pearson, who resigned from the M. E. Church because he outgrew it. This sermon was delivered in a Universalist church, and from the text, The Coming Reformation:

"Ours is a mechanical age. It produces wealth so rapidly that all previous ages seem poor. We have grown rich faster than we have learned the proper use of our riches. We are making money but we do not know yet how to distribute it. Many men are too rich for their own good. Many are too poor for comfort, for health, for nobility, for decent, progressive, civilized life. Everything is subordinated to the desire to make money.

"A moneyed aristocracy—an aristocracy of financiers, of manufacturers and merchants, and railway and steamship kings—now rules the civilized world. The working classes are discontented and threatening. Women and children freeze to death because rich men make coal scarce and prices high in order to make larger profits. Women gasp and swelter in summer and children die because some men want to make abnormal profits by cornering ice. Men and women are underfed and children die of inanition because food is rendered artificially dear.

FABULOUS WEALTH FOR A FEW.

"Men, women and children sit in darkness because kerosene oil, stored in the earth by God for the use of all his children, is made under inequitable laws to yield fabulous wealth to a few persons.

"Men, women and children are crowded into small, dark, comfortless, unsanitary tenements, and puny, diseased children are born and die there because lumber, brick, glass, iron and lead are made artificially dear in the present cruel exigencies for wealth.

"I do not see how any intelligent man can expect the existing order of things to continue much longer, or how any humane man can desire that it should. Nor does it require very much prophetic foresight to see that it will not.

RELIGIOUS REFORMATION.

"Now I dare say that some of you are wondering what all this has to do with liberal opinions in religion. If religious belief were a mere abstract proposition, if theology was mere metaphysical opinion, if the Bible was nothing but ancient history, I for one would not spend my time discussing them. It is because religion is the basis and mainspring of all moral and noble living that religious reformation is necessary.

"Religion has lost its power simply because the current exposition of it no longer appeals or can appeal to the intellect of men.

"Historical theories weaken religion. With the advance of knowledge, religion must to be true before people will think it important.

"The four great orthodox superstitions that now impede progress are the fall, the atonement, miracles and the deity of Jesus. The whole scientific world has accepted the doctrine of evolution.

"We are told that when we reach the stature of Christ we too shall be able to perform his miracles. People of the same power can do the same things. Suppose everybody multiplied loaves and fishes at his pleasure, changed water into wine, walked upon the sea as upon dry land, withered a tree or healed a man at a word, what kind of a world should we have? The theory seems to me silly and shocking.

LAITY NOW WIDE AWAKE.

"The Bible is the literature of a nation, and represents all the varieties of opinion of that nation. It was easy to maintain that Jesus was God in the middle ages, when the Bible was inaccessible and the laity too ignorant to read. But now that the book is open and the people are wide awake, it is a very different thing.

"Could an American fifty years of age and of sound mind make a summer trip to Europe and, by crossing the Atlantic, forget his name and that he ever lived in the United States? If you can believe that by an effort of will a man can dip himself in Lethe and make waters of oblivion flow over all his past, then you begin to understand the demand made on human credulity by the theory that Jesus was God and did not always know it."

"THE MERCY OF GOD"

was the theme of a farewell sermon delivered by the Rev. M. Edward Fawsett, rector of the Church of St. Bartholomew. He said:

"There has been a popular and general revolt against the harsh and gloomy theology which described God as a tyrant and strove to move men through their fears. The God of Calvinism is almost dead. He was pictured as vindictive, arbitrary and cruel. The horrible beings with whom Hindoo imagination peopled the heavens were scarce more terrible than he.

"He predestined men to hell; damned them before they were born; consigned them by millions to endless torment amid the material flames of an unquenchable hell. He forbade human beings to have any pleasures save in reading the decalogue and in meditating upon the fearful punishment which would overtake any one who, however innocently, whistled on the Sabbath.

"Before the New Testament was written our church described God with one word—love. That was and that is the truly catholic theology: 'God is love.' This great truth that was obscured by medieval purgatory, and hidden under the frantic theology of Protestant reformers, is being rediscovered. Men revolt against any 'confession' that would seem to consign helpless infants to eternal wrath.

"Old formularies remain in some cases, but the hearts of the people are better than their formularies, which were begotten of men in the heat of intemperate debate. The age is reaching out to grasp the old and the better ideals of the Godhead."

"FREE THOUGHT"

was the subject of a sermon delivered by the Rev. W. Hanson Pulsford, of the Church of the Messiah, in Memorial Chapel, Woodlawn avenue and Fifty-seventh street. He said:

"We cannot afford a type of religion to which free thought is an enemy. For so long as thought is bound to the imperfect vision of the past, so long as we try to wrest it into accord with something other than the facts which inquiry discloses, it may be prejudice to dogma or credulity, but it is not free and it is not thought.

"Free thought and infidelity are the snares of that ever active and most potent deity, the devil, only when blind acceptance of dogmatic statement is our ideal in religion.

"But unbiased investigation has transformed our relations to the universe and is making it our servant. Mastery is born of free inquiry. Not dogma, but thought, leads to knowledge, and knowledge is power. So little by little trust in reasoned appeal to facts begins to prevail even in religion. Men are becoming willing to bring even the sacred 'articles' into accord with the results of patient investigation. The time dawns when thought, wholly loosed at last from prejudice and passion and fear, shall be supreme also in the highest realms of life.

"Free thought is the inevitable condition of religion if religion is to order the enlarging life of men."

"VISION OF POSSIBILITIES"

was the subject taken by Rev. M. W. Haynes, pastor of the Belden Avenue Baptist Church, and in part he said:

"The church is here to save men, not to maintain certain fixed policies and support effete institutions. I would be glad if we might have the good old-fashioned revival meetings once a year and bring hundreds into the church. That worked well fifty years ago.

"A few carom boards, a ping pong table and a piano are worth more in reaching young men than any revivalist you may employ.

"It is the entering wedge for a man's soul. Many are before me to-day as Christian men whose first introduction to this church was at a carom board. Why has it taken so long for the church to awaken to this?

"It has been under the spell of anaesthetics or it would have gotten into this work long ago.

"And what about young women? There is hardly a church that has thought it worth while to pay any attention to young women. Why should not the church pay special attention to them? Why should it not surround them with its maternal care?

"I shall never be satisfied until the church is a blaze of glory each night in the week. Let the church be open as long as the dens of vice are open. If they keep open till midnight let the church be open.

"Give the belated traveler a place where he may get a drink of water or rest for a moment his weary limbs. Let us meet the charms and attractions of vice with virtue more charming and attractive.

"There are great possibilities for the church here. These young men and women are the church of the future. Wise is the man who becomes the pastor of the church of the future."

And so it goes, and so it is bound to go. The fact is, the people are fast beginning to know they are free to think for themselves and the sermons that were all exhortation and without common sense in past days will not do to-day.

The world is awake. This is an age of machinery and electricity, an age of energy, ambition and unfoldment. The man who outgrows an orthodox church to-day and comes up out of it, becomes at once popular. Newspapers comment on the occurrence, the readers talk about him and the more he is criticised the more apt he is to be lionized by the public.

Whenever Prof. Pearson is announced to lecture the house is hardly large enough to hold the audience of anxious friends.

The minister of almost any orthodox church to-day who preaches the most liberal, the most advanced thought, is the one who has a full house. All this is but the manifestation of appreciation of talent, intelligence, noble manhood and freedom.

Every man or woman who is able to give the world some food for thought reaches the mass of humanity and leads them a little higher, a little farther from the ashes of a dead and buried past.

Spiritualism has been no small factor in this great wave of liberation, with its mediums and speakers teaching the elevating ideas of spirit return and communion, teaching the fallacy of the old religions, and unlocking the door of an imprisoned world intellect. Let us not be discouraged, but keep the philosophy before the people.

When we see an occasional Spiritualist attending church somewhere and giving there liberally of his time and money, let us ask ourselves why this is thus? Let us examine into the kind of meetings he would usually have to attend in our own ranks and see if he is not in advance of most of them; see if there is any food for thought for the more intellectual seekers after the real, unadulterated Spiritualism; see if he has not tried until disgusted to find something that would lead him higher.

Let us not be disheartened if we cannot convince the world that we have found those they long thought dead and established communication with them; but knowing we have aided in the good work of raising the old Hell and bringing Heaven down to earth, let us purify ourselves the best we can under the circumstances and move along arm in arm with everybody else who is trying to do good in life, and some day the world will see that we are not so bad after all, when purged of the baser element that has drifted in from the outside, from the sea of greed and avarice.

The churches are making great progress toward the true religion, "the brotherhood of man," and there let us meet them and unite for the upliftment of all humanity.

A CHANCE TO MAKE MONEY

I have berries, grapes and peaches a year old, fresh as when picked. I used the California Cold Process. Do not heat or seal the fruit, just put it up cold. Keeps perfectly fresh, and costs almost nothing; can put up a bushel in ten minutes. Last year I sold directions to over 120 families in one week; anyone will pay a dollar for directions when they see the beautiful samples of fruit. As there are many people poor like myself, I consider it my duty to give my experience to such and feel confident anyone can make one or two hundred dollars round home in a few days. I will mail sample of fruit and full directions to any of your readers for actual cost of the samples, postage, etc. FRANCIS CASEY, St. Louis, Mo.

A Message from Thomas Paine.

To the Editor:—From Wm. W. Aber's book, "Rending the Vail," page 307, I extract the following, from Thomas Paine:

"Good evening, friends. I am glad to meet you here in this way.

"Our glorious work is moving on, and I am truly glad that it is progressing with such rapid strides throughout the world. No discovery in the domain of science ever yet made greater progress among the people in a single half-century than the great scientific fact of a demonstrable future for man has since its enunciation, less than fifty years ago.

"Yet strange is it that so great a boon to the race must fight its way everywhere.

"Fathers, mothers, husbands, wives, children, brothers and sisters every where mourning, sorrowing, weeping, wailing, as they look into the desolate grave or behold the empty chair! Will not hear the good news, will not look as the angels draw the vail aside.

"And when the white-robed kindred 'over there' would draw near, would sing again the old home refrain, they are driven away; the gentle caressing of an angel mother is denounced as the scheming of some diabolical fiend.

"Oh, friends! when I look upon the floods of tears that might be dried away, when I behold the millions of sorrowing hearts that might be comforted, but for the intervention of a designing priesthood who live fat upon the sorrowings of desolate hearts, my soul sickens and determines me to go on with the warface of breaking the fetters that bind so many millions of precious souls to a mercenary sacerdotalism founded on the fables of an imaginary God.

"This God, through the priesthood as his medium, has in all ages fought with fire and sword, shot and shell, gibbet and guillotine, prison and proscription, slang and slander, the advocates of the advent into your earth among the children of men of anything calculated to lessen the iron grip that the priest has had upon men and women.

They would murder a Bruno for daring to think for himself.

They would lead upon the scaffold an innocent Quaker woman because it was reported than an angry God had said: 'Suffer not a witch to live.'

"In the history of astronomy its advocates must recant or burn at the stake because this imaginary leader of the priesthood had been reported as saying something about the four corners of the earth.

The great science of phrenology was tabooed because it was at variance with the supposed teaching of their supposed God; and geology, too, must be scoffed because it teaches that, instead of the six days of creation, millions of ages were consumed.

"Thus, step by step, science has shown that the theological ideas of God are false, and that what the theologians have heretofore taught to be the true God have not been and are not God at all, but merely false or ignorant conceptions of the true God.

"Oh, if my orthodox friends were here to-night, I would scorch them to the very quick; only desiring, however, to have them exchange their remaining ignorance for eternal truth.

"I do not come back here for nothing, nor to advocate theories; but to tell you what I know."

FROM ONE LONG DEAD.

What! You here in the moonlight and thinking of me?
Is it you, O my comrade, who laughed at my jest?
But you wept when I told you I longed to be free,
And you mourned for a while when they laid me at rest.

I've been dead all these years! and to-night in your heart
There's a stir of emotion, a vision that slips—
It's my face in the moonlight that gives you a start,
It's my name that in joy rushes up to your lips!

Yes, I'm young, oh, so young, and so little I know
A mere child that is learning to walk and to run;
While I grasp at the shadows that wave to and fro
I am dazzled a bit by the light of the sun.

I am learning the lesson. I try to grow wise,
But at night I am baffled and worn by the strife;
I am humbled, and then there's an impulse to rise,
And a voice whispers, "Onward and win! This is Life!"

And the Force that is drawing me up to the height,
That inspires me and thrills me—each day a new birth,
Is the Force that to Chaos said, "Let there be Light!"
And it gave us sweet glimpses of heaven and earth.

It is Love! and you know it and feel it, my soul!
For you love me in spite of the grave and its bars.
And it moves the whole Universe on to its goal,
And it draws frail Humanity up to the stars. —Egbert Bridges.

SAILING ON.

I stood on the shore of the ocean
And far o'er the water gazed,
That seemed in expanse and commotion,
Eternity paraphased.

I watched a great ship go a-sailing
And gradually sinking from sight,
Till the top yard alone was left trailing
Where the heavens and waters unite.

Of a sudden the sea swelled before me;
It sank, but the sail—it was gone;
And a mystical feeling came o'er me,
For I knew it was still sailing on.

And before me arose a delusion,
A vision of life's rocking sea,
Where many a dear and true one
Went sailing away from me.

I felt, though scarce say they were going,
Yet they fainter and fainter became;
And the wind kept steadily blowing
From the shore they would ne'er touch again.

Of a sudden the sea swelled before me,
When it sank I saw they were gone;
And the mystical feeling came o'er me
For I knew they were still sailing on;

And that soon I, too, would be sailing
On the voyage that never will cease;
Soon leave the world with its wailing,
To bask on the waters of peace.

In the World Celestial

Is a wonderful book, being the personal experiences of a man whose dead sweetheart, after appearing to him many times, etherealized, materialized and through trance mediums, has him put into a hypnotic trance by spirit scientists and held in that condition for ten days, which time he spends with her in the celestial spheres and then returns to earth with perfect recollection of what he saw and heard in that realm of the so-called dead. He tells his wonderful story to his friend who gives it to the world in his best style. This friend is Dr. T. A Bland, the well-known author, scientist and reformer. This book has a brilliant introduction by that distinguished preacher, Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D., president of the American Congress of Liberal Religions, who gives it the weight of his unqualified endorsement. Everybody will be charmed with it, for it is not only a great spiritual book, but a most beautiful love romance of two worlds. It is printed in elegant style, bound in cloth and gold, and has a full page portrait of the angel heroine, from a spirit painting. Price, $1.00.

Translated by T. B. Saunders. Cloth, 75 cents. "Schopenhauer is one of the few philosophers who can be generally understood without a commentary. All his theories claim to be drawn direct from facts, to be suggested by observation, and to interpret the world as it is; and whatever view he takes, he is constant in his appeal to the experience of common life. This characteristic endows his style with a freshness and vigor which would be difficult to match in the philosophic writing of any country, and impossible in that of Germany."—Translator.

The Arnold-Dickson Mediums, Los Angeles, Cal.

In California at the present time a great deal of bitter discussion, accompanied with denunciations, is going on in relation to the materialization circles of Messrs. Arnold and Dickson, located at Los Angeles. The Record of that city asserts in more emphatic language than we would care to use, that the phenomena given in their presence are not what they are claimed to be—genuine manifestations of spirit power—but that they are produced altogether by mortal means and instrumentalities. The mediums are threatening a libel suit, while the Record reporters are heartily wishing from their inmost souls that it will be commenced at an early date, and promising some rich and startling revealments when the trial comes off.

We do indeed hope that the "Arnold-Dickson Outfit," as the Record slurringly calls these mediums, will commence a libel suit at once against that paper, putting the damages at $25,000 at least, and then let the law take its course. If the Record clan have lied, they should be put behind the bars; on the other hand, if they have told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth in reference to these mediums, then the matter stands forth in a different light, and Spiritualism has to suffer therefor, and the mediums are ruined.

We do earnestly hope these mediums will seek vindication in court. The charges against them made in the Record have been circulated far and wide, and wherever they may go in the future they will be confronted with them, greatly to their injury. $25,000 will hardly compensate them for their loss of prestige. The Record should be taught a severe lesson—a lesson that it will long remember, for libeling innocent parties—if innocent they be!

On the other hand, the mediums should before going into court fully realize that they are innocent of the charges made. If they have been guilty of trickery, the Record will undoubtedly prove the same, and the result will be disastrous. Here is a case in point. Mabel Aber Jackman commenced a libel suit, with a great flourish of words and gesticulations, against this paper, claiming $25,000 damages. We cheerfully prepared for the trial, and piled up evidence mountain high, and when the case was called up by the Judge, she did not dare to face the vast amount we had accumulated, and ingloriously and cowardly retreated, tacitly acknowledging the charges made by us to be true, and injuring herself greatly thereby.

Assuming, then, that Arnold and Dickson are genuine mediums, that their character is irreproachable, and that they have been badly defamed, they owe it to themselves, to good morals, to Spiritualists, to common decency and the public, to seek vindication in court. But we would first advise them to be sure that they are right and then go ahead.

The attitude of the secular press towards Spiritualism has never been friendly, and we would like to see every one who libels a medium compelled to pay heavy damages; but up to date no paper has been compelled to do it.

That Los Angeles is the home of a great deal of debauchery in mediumship, is no doubt true. Some time ago we received a communication giving the details of remarkable spirit manifestations—remarkable if true—in a public hall of that city. The names of the mediums were not familiar to us, so we sent the communication to a friend in Los Angeles for investigation. In the first place he went to the number of the place where the writer claimed to reside; he was not there, and was not even known. It was a sharp, unscrupulous, dare-devil method to get a fulsome endorsement of tricksters—such tricksters as at present are flooding all our large cities, much to the injury of our cause.

Independence.

Independence Day has come and gone again, with its irrepressible and multitudinous small boy, with all sorts of ingenious devices to make noise, smoke, foul odors, and discomfort generally.

When one sits down and takes a square look at the matter, it seems a most nonsensical way of celebrating the anniversary of a nation's Independence. But there is a moral that may well be considered, with Independence Day as a text.

It was well to proclaim independence from thraldom to a foreign power, and to establish civil and religious liberty. Still better were it to establish in the hearts and minds of the people a thorough emancipation from religious or other intolerance that militates against freedom of thought and opinion.

The genuine independence confirms one's full liberty to think, and to accept and advocate that which appeals to his judgment as truth, without being made a victim to social ostracism, or to legal persecutions because of one's beliefs; such as are inflicted even to-day upon Spiritualists, Adventists, etc., in some parts of our country where medievalism still rules in courts of law and municipal legislatures.

But the spirit of freedom is growing, and intelligence will gain the day for right.

HOW TO SPIRITUALIZE ONE'S NATURE

I have discovered that bad and unpleasant feelings create harmful chemical products in the body, which are physically injurious. Good, pleasant, benevolent and cheerful feelings create beneficial chemical products which are physically healthful. These products may be detected by chemical analysis, in the perspiration and secretion of the individual. I have detected more than forty of the bad, and as many of the good.

Suppose half a dozen men in a room. One feels depressed, another remorseful, another ill tempered, another jealous, another cheerful, another benevolent. It is a warm day; they perspire. Samples of their perspiration are placed in the hands of the psycho-physicist. Under his examination they reveal all those emotional conditions distinctly and unmistakably.

To sum it up, it is found that for each bad emotion there is a corresponding chemical change in the tissues of the body, which is life-depressing and poisonous. Contrariwise every good emotion makes a life-promoting change. A noble and generous action blesses the doer as well as the beneficiary. Every thought which enters the mind is registered in the brain by a change in the structure of its cells. The change is a physical change more or less permanent.

Anybody may go into the business of building his own mind. The thinking organ undergoes perpetual changes in cell structure and is never finished.

Even in old age it is not too late.

Let the esoteric mind-builder systematically devote an hour each day to calling up pleasant ideas and memories. Let him summon those finer feelings of benevolence and unselfishness, which are called up in ordinary life only now and then. Let him make this a regular exercise, like swinging dumb bells. Let him gradually increase the time devoted to these psychical gymnastics giving them sixty or ninety minutes per diem.

At the end of a month he will find the change in himself surprising. The alteration will be apparent in his actions and thoughts.

It will have been registered in the cell structure of his brain. Cells useful for good thinking will have been well developed, while others productive of evil will have shrunk. Morally speaking, the man will be a great improvement on his former self.—Prof. Elmer Gates.

EFFECTS OF ANGER.

An English journal thus comments on the injurious effects of anger: "Anger serves the unhappy mortal who indulges in it much the same as intoxicants constantly taken do the inebriate. It grows into a sort of disease which has various and terrible results. Sir Richard Quain said not long ago: 'He is a man very rich indeed in physical power who can afford to be angry.' This is true. Every time a man becomes white or red with anger he is in danger of his life. The heart and brain are the organs mostly affected when fits of passion are indulged in. Not only does anger cause partial paralysis of the small blood vessels, but the heart's action becomes intermittent—that is, every now and then it drops a beat—much the same thing as is experienced by excessive smokers."

IMMORTAL YOUTH.

We read continually of well attested instances where sight and hearing are recovered at a very advanced age, and occasionally where new teeth are grown, and other signs of renewed youth are manifested. These instances point to a law which may be set in operation not only to rejuvenate the aged but to keep the youthful ever young.

Many interesting theories have been offered by those who are interested in the discovery and application of this law. Efforts have been made to adjust the waste to the repair in the physical economy. Elixirs and serums have been experimented with, but to no purpose. Nature in her true occult fashion has not bestowed the desired renewal of youth upon those who have resorted to material means, but has here and there sought out some quiet little Quaker lady or some venerable patriarch on whom to work, without visible agency, her work of rejuvenation. To them the world has rushed all eager to learn the secret, but there seemed nothing to reveal beyond a few facts as to diet and regimen which had possibly been very regular and temperate."

"The individuals so rejuvenated had by no means discovered the law of rejuvenation. They were simply acted upon by forces of which they understood nothing. Hence the renewal of life was of short duration and merely served the purpose of indicating the existence of a law which if discovered and set intelligently in operation would restore to age the lost condition of youth.

The law is not to be found in physical science. It is purely metaphysical in nature and operation. It is for this reason that in spite of all physical evidence to the contrary the world still holds to its hope in the face of all discouragement. Still it believes Immortal Youth to be a possibility and why?

Because the Understanding which is in touch with Reality knows it to be a truth, and will continue to utter its testimony to that truth until the reason is thoroughly awakened to its work of proving the ways and means for attaining the control of the law regulating the isolated occurrence and finally applying it to life in general. The homely old adage has it—straws show which way the wind blows—and the wind certainly sets in the direction of immortal youth.—Kate Boehme.

Heaven and Hell.

Rev. Thos. B. Gregory writes upon the subject of "Heaven and Hell," for the Chicago American, as follows:

The Rev. Dr. Blodgett, pastor of St. Paul's Methodist Episcopal Church, Cincinnati, has made some startling discoveries in the realm of theology.

After years of patient investigation he has succeeded in locating heaven and hell, and from this time forth neither saint nor sinner need be ignorant as to where he will spend eternity.

Heaven, so the Cincinnati divine informs us, is to be located on the earth, after it shall have been properly disinfected and purified by fire; while hell is to be established in one of the nearby planets—probably Mars.

To those who have kept tab on the vagaries of the theological mind the "discovery" by the Buckeye preacher will come with no particular surprise. The man who believes that the Bible is infallibly and verbally inspired; that every word from Genesis to Revelation "means something;" that there is a sort of divine cipher running through the entire Scripture, and that it is his business to find out what that cipher is and to reveal it to the world—the discoveries of such a man need create no surprise. He is liable to "discover" anything.

But the divine in question has gone away beyond his fellow discoverers of earlier times and has found out that hell is to be not a place of torment but a place of real, solid comfort for those who are to fetch up there.

"God," says the Cincinnati minister, "wants all of his creatures to be happy and comfortable. In other words, the soul that sins will be more comfortable in hell than it would be in heaven among the pure souls. Among souls like unto his own the sinner in hell will be at ease, for he will be with boon companions."

Now, while this discovery will make the sinners feel extra good, it cannot but create consternation in the ranks of the saints. Dr. Blodgett's discovery will, we are afraid, prove to be a boomerang which is destined to come back at him in a way he is not counting on.

To tell men that hell is a pleasant place is to put a premium on wickedness, and if that is not heresy it is hard to say what heresy is.

But should the case of the Rev. Dr. Blodgett ever come to trial before his brother ministers of the Methodist church, if they are sensible, level-headed men they will conclude that the Cincinnati man is beside himself, and so will nol. pros. the case at once.

In the meantime it may do no harm to give the real location of heaven and hell.

Heaven is in the brain and heart of the man or woman who has a clear conscience. Hell is in the breast of the man or woman whose conscience is corrupted.

Milton's Satan, floundering through chaos, exclaim:

"Which way I fly is hell; Myself am hell."

The being who is in rebellion against truth and right is in hell, no matter where he may be. Hell is not located; it is contingent upon character.

Good character is heaven; bad character is hell.

Theologians have racked their brains for centuries with trying to place the "good" and the "bad." But nature will attend to that matter herself—has been attending to it right along.

One man who will read this article lives on Brunswick street, Chicago. He is an honest man; he is true to his family; he respects himself and has the respect of his friends and neighbors; he reverences the moral law and can look at the sun or into the face of his fellow men without blenching.

Across the street from this man lives another who is a rogue and a scamp; who has no respect for the sanctities of life; who has no reverence for any law except the law of self and selfish gratification, and who when an honest man looks him in the eye trembles like a guilty thing afraid.

Both live on the same street and but a few score feet apart, and yet, morally speaking, one is in heaven and the other in hell. The two men, facing each other on the same street, are as far apart as the poles of infinity!

The good man lives in the world that has been made for him by his goodness; the bad man lives in the world that has been made for him by his badness—and the two worlds are separated by a distance a thousand times greater than that which separates earth from the remotest fixed star.

Socrates, Marcus Aurelius, Phocian, Sir Phillip Sidney and Emerson are in heaven. Through all the ages and across all the geographical miles—from 400 B. C. to 1000 A. D., from Greece to America—the law is the same. The good man is in heaven.

And the other side of the same law is that the bad man is in hell. Badness is hell. There is a slight interregnum between the lightning's flash and the thunder that follows; but badness and its hell are linked together in indistinguishable contiguity.

To violate the moral law is to instantly feel the penalty which is attached to the violation.

The Boston wag who declared that if a certain good man in the "Hub" should happen to go to hell he would instantly change the climate of the place and make it delightful was not far out of the way.

Character carries along with it its own environment, and while the environment of a noble character is heaven that of a mean character is hell.

"The kingdom of heaven," said the great Galilean, "is within you," and within us, too, is the kingdom of the devil and its demons.

Live right and you are in heaven. Live wrong and you are in hell.

There are many ministers to-day advocating from their pulpits the identical principles so far as heaven and hell are concerned as are the Spiritualist lecturers and do not know it, or if they do know they would not acknowledge it, and some of them say they "believe our loved ones are not dead, but are all around us."

This is not unusual with those who have grown beyond their creeds, but we cannot call them Spiritualists until they so declare themselves, neither do we wish to claim them until they see fit to come to us in spirit and in truth. We already have a few moral cowards in our ranks who chase around our mediums for free readings, or borrow The Progressive Thinker, or other Spiritualist paper, and then go and pay their contributions to the church. This will eventually right itself, probably when their Christian friends learn they visit mediums, and give them a few snubs.

We are glad to note the freedom of the secular press regarding these old fogy notions. When the press becomes unchained from Catholicism and Protestantism and speaks for humanity and brotherly love here and now and leaves the future to time and eternity, the world may have some hope of a new era of life and universal comfort and joy.

All these years of rant and exhortation upon the question of Hell and Heaven, the Devil and God, have been to Nature's immutable principles about as effective as the snarl of the coyote or the bray of a lost ass, and as real sound sense must come with the constant development of the human brain, constant thinking, pondering, developing and reasoning, rational ideas must take the place of those old superstitions.

Children are born, grow up, remain a few years, either sow good grain or tares and reap a good harvest or make a failure, make the world worse for their having lived in it; evolve something grand and good or for the destruction of morals and human happiness, and pass on into the next sphere of activity. Thus it has ever been and thus it will ever be, and any amount of word pictures of Heaven and Hell as fixed places for the good and bad will make no change upon the laws of being.

The fact is, the church has preached what could not be proven so long that the world has at last made the discovery and set the wise(?) men of the pulpit to thinking of their salaries and empty pews, and that has really touched and awakened them to the true situation, and they are one by one crawling from their old hard shells into a modern world, a world of science, of thought and invention; a world that has grown since they went into the shell and closed the aperture.

Such articles as the above from one who has preached all his life, and come up through the fog of superstition to the threshold of the truth, are calculated to enlighten people who do not know of the existence of such a thing as a Spiritualist paper.

The truth must take root and grow in time.

Spiritualism and Pseudo Science.

It is undoubtedly true that scientists as a class have educated themselves away from a recognition of the spiritual in the realm of Nature. They have, in the past especially, engendered and fostered a sort of class prejudice against anything like acquiescence in the facts and truths pertaining to the phenomena, and the philosophy based thereon, of Spiritualism. They have developed a class conceit that they are the wise ones, far above all others, and if they should die wisdom would die from earth and be buried with them.

Not all scientists are of such sort, and the exceptions are notably increasing during recent years.

The spiritual idea is taking deep root in many minds of the freer sort, and those who investigate to learn what is truth, with minds open to accept it when found, have been bold to acknowledge their conviction of the reality of spirit phenomena.

The scientific training of the guild has had a distinctly materialistic trend, and has developed a bias against any explanation of spirit phenomena except a baldly materialistic one. It is still all too prevalent among a certain class that make great pretensions to scientific knowledge, to flout the idea that any physical manifestations purporting to be wrought by spirit force, are or can be produced by other than materialistic causes.

Of late, however, the prevalence of manifestations produced by unseen yet strikingly potent forces, claiming to be spirit entities, and which cannot be explained on any strictly materialistic hypothesis, has impelled a recourse to other methods of explanation to account for the mystery.

Among these newer explanations is that which Mr. T. Jay Hudson exploits with much positiveness and great show of demonstration in his book, "The Law of Psychic Phenomena."

He attempts to show that the so-called phenomena of "spiritism," all find their source and solution in the action of man's "subjective mind." This "subjective mind" is capable of moving heavy material objects, etc.

Why it should be any easier for a scientist to believe this theory, than to believe the manifestations are produced as they claim to be by unfleshed spirits, is not easy to understand, except that the "scientific" mind is averse, even to prejudice, to accept the spiritual hypothesis, and will take any other hypothesis in preference to that. Such seems to be the attitude of this sort of scientific mind.

There are multitudes of facts of phenomena of "spiritism," (as Hudson delights to call it), which cannot be explained on his "subjective mind" theory, even if the "subjective mind" as an independent entity were an established fact, which it is not. While Spiritualists may accede that some things may be explained as caused by occult action of the mind of persons yet in the form, they can do this reasonably, without accepting a distinct "subjective mind," which becomes insane when it acts without the control of the "objective mind," which "objective mind" dies when man's physical form dies, and thus leaves the poor "subjective mind," all there is left of man, eternally insane.

Is it not an insane science that leads to such conclusions?

Two Eminent Spiritualists Passed to Spirit Life.

Mrs. Carrie F. Weatherford lately passed to spirit life, at Alaska, Mich. Mrs. Weatherford was a woman of marked ability, and on the rostrum she did a most excellent work for Spiritualism. She was held in high esteem by everybody.

Dr. Dumont C. Dake, of New York, has also gone to the realm of souls. He was widely known in the West at one time, and had an extensive practice there. He, too, was prominent as a Spiritualist and reformer.

BENEFITS OF THE HOME CIRCLE.

My first experience was to lose two darling children, a boy five years old, and a girl two years old. After they had been dead five or six months I heard of a good medium in Cleveland. I made arrangements with her for a sitting, and during the seance my little children came and said, "Papa, we are not dead; we are still living, and you should not cry for us." They said I should sit in a circle for them.

We formed a circle around a small table. Before we had sat six months, we began to get manifestations. We could see lights in a dark room; also misty forms, and a current of electricity would run through our arms and body; then the spirits took control of one in the circle, the medium being my eldest daughter. They gave good lectures and advice. Then we got a trumpet, and held trumpet circles in a dark room. The controls, Red Rose and Dr. Thunder Cloud, come, talk to us and give good advice. My dear little children come to us and talk. My little Alice brought me a flower one night, and said it was for papa. The children say that Bessie will make a good materializing medium, and they will materialize in my own home and talk to us face to face.

My advice to the readers of the good old Progressive Thinker is to form home circles and get communications from the higher spheres, in their homes.

What a grand thing it is to converse with our dear friends that have passed beyond, in our own homes.

Two Lines of Spiritualistic Work.

It was a most wisely appropriate finis to the work of Moses and Mattie E. Hull in Buffalo, that they should emphasize the great importance of the training of the children of Spiritualists in Progressive Lyceums.

As stated by our correspondent: "Mr. Hull's work of the morning was on behalf of the young; his discourse from first to last was an earnest appeal that parents who are Spiritualists should consider the importance of proper Sunday-School training. He emphasized the thought, that if Spiritualism was the best system for adults in the way of teaching human ethics, it was the one system, above all others, that should be taught to the children."

Had Mr. Hull said no more by way of farewell, these words of his would clearly indicate his hearty and earnest wishes for the welfare and substantial growth of the society to which he has ministered several years past, and from which he now departs to enter upon another important work—that of education as a help to workers in the Cause of Spiritualism.

The Progressive Lyceum, as an educator of the children especially, is of immense importance in the solid growth of Spiritual societies; the work of the Morris Pratt Institute under Mr. Hull's charge, will supplement all lyceum work, and carry education farther along, under the care of Spiritual educators, into higher fields of study.

The full success of both of these lines of education means much to Spiritualism, and it will be well that Spiritualists realize the fact and govern themselves accordingly.

MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE.

Report of the Meeting of the Board of Directors.

The first regular meeting of the board of directors of the Morris Pratt Institute was held in Whitewater in the college building, June 25, 1902. The officers present were H. D. Barrett, President of the N. S. A.; Rev. Moses Hull, President of the college; J. C. Bump, treasurer; Hon. Alonzo Thompson and C. L. Stewart.

It was decided to make necessary improvements in the building as rapidly as possible so as to be ready for the opening of the school the fourth Tuesday in September, such improvements to consist of a steam heating plant, bath room and proper plumbing and sewer. Mr. Pratt in deeding the property to the trustees reserved for his own use several rooms in the building, but during the board meeting, realizing the advantage to the school by so doing, he relinquished them and gave a clear title to the property, thus adding to the already munificent gift his generosity had bestowed upon us.

In order to meet the expense of making the changes necessary to be made and the purchase of furniture for the building, it was thought best to make a special plea for assistance, both financial and in the way of furniture.

The cost of putting in the heating plant will be fifteen hundred dollars ($1500). This amount could be easily raised among fifteen persons who would donate one hundred each, and we then could get the work started at once. I have the pledges of five who will give that sum; who will be one of the other ten?

There are twelve rooms that can be fitted up for students, some of them large enough to accommodate two, single beds, with commode, table, chairs, dresser or chest of drawers, these with matting on the floors will make up the furniture of the sleeping rooms, and any one furnishing rooms will have the privilege of naming the same. There are other rooms that will need carpets, easy chairs, rugs, pictures and all that goes to make up the furniture of any home, such as bedding, linen, dishes, etc. Now, Spiritualists and friends of education, it is time to make some sacrifice for the good of this work; will you not come to the front and assist us who have this work in hand and are doing all in our power to promote its welfare?

Let me hear from you at once with your subscriptions. Remember littles make much, and if all will do what they can, not what they think they can, we will be ready to open the school without any indebtedness over us. It is hoped that those who have subscribed an amount will be ready to meet it the first of August, as that will enable us to know what to reckon on. Please let us hear from you all.

Sincerely and fraternally,

LIFE

Life! I know not what thou art,
But know that thou and I must part;
And when, or how, or where we met
I own to me's a secret yet.

Life! we've been long together
Through pleasant and through cloudy weather;
'Tis hard to part when friends are dear—
Perhaps 't will cost a sigh, a tear;
Then steal away, give little warning,
Choose thine own time;
Say not "Good night," but in some brighter clime
Bid me "Good morning."

THE STAR SPANGLED BANNER.

(Dedicated to the Fourth of July.)

O! say, can you see, by the dawn's early light,
What so proudly we hailed at the twilight's last gleaming?
Whose broad stripes and bright stars thro' the perilous fight,
O'er the ramparts we watched were so gallantly streaming!
And the rocket's red glare, the bombs bursting in air,
Gave proof thro' the night that our flag was still there;
O! say, does the star spangled banner yet wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?

On that shore, dimly seen thro' the mists of the deep,
Where the foe's haughty host in dread silence reposes,
What is that which the breeze, o'er the towering steep,
As it fitfully blows, now conceals, now discloses?
Now it catches the gleam of the morning's first beam,
In full glory reflected, now shines on the stream;
'Tis the star spangled banner, O, long may it wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!

And where is that band who so vauntingly swore
That the havoc of war and the battle's confusion,
A home and a country should leave us no more?
Their blood has washed out their foul footsteps' pollution;
No refuge could save the hireling and slave
From the terror of flight or the gloom of the grave.
And the star spangled banner in triumph doth wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave!

O! thus be it ever when freemen shall stand
Between their loved homes and the war's desolation;
Blest with victory and peace, may the heav'n rescued land
Praise the power that hath made and preserved us a nation.
Then conquer we must when our cause it is just,
And this be our motto, "In God is our trust."
And the star spangled banner in triumph shall wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave.

A WEIRD AND STARTLING PROPHECY.

ACHSA WALKER ARRANGED FOR HER OWN FUNERAL — CHILD ALSO MADE A WILL—SAID SHE WOULD DIE WITH LITTLE MAUDE WALKER — PROPHECY ALL COMES TRUE.

To the Editor:—It appears from the Milwaukee Free Press, Wis., that Dr. O. W. Joslin, a dentist in the Iron Block, who returned yesterday from Kingston, Green Lake county, where he attended the funeral of his little niece, Achsa Walker, says that the village is stirred up over the tragedy which occurred Monday. Dr. Joslin's niece and Maude Moore, each 15 years old, were drowned in the mill pond, the death of both girls together having been foretold some time ago by little Miss Walker, who had made all preparations for her own funeral, including the appointment of her pallbearers and the making of a will.

DEATH IN A MILL POND.

Enjoying a half holiday on Monday, the girls went to the mill pond, and after playing about the banks for a time, stepped into the boat of Dr. Bothwell, lying unfastened on the beach, and paddled out into the pond. The children had brought hooks and lines with them for fishing. Suddenly in the excitement of feeling a tug on her line, Maude Moore stood up in the boat, which instantly veered to one side, throwing the girls into the water. Immediately her companion was seen to stand up in the boat also and heard to ask:

"Maude, can't you swim?"

What the reply was could not be heard and whether Achsa Walker lost her balance or plunged into the water to try to save her friend, or to join her in the death which she knew her companion must meet, and thus fulfill her own prediction made months before, will never be known, but the second girl was seen to plunge into the water and disappear. The only witness to the tragedy was Romeo Volkmann, a small boy, who was in a boat only a few rods away. The little fellow was so completely frightened that he could offer no assistance, and instead of notifying persons at the home of G. A. Joslin, uncle of the Walker girl, who lived on the banks of the pond only a short distance away, Volkmann rowed to the town and notified a party of men. The men reached the spot, and although the body of Maude Moore was recovered within thirty minutes after the accident, all efforts of Dr. Bothwell and others to resuscitate her were without result. The body of Achsa Walker was not found until 8 o'clock.

HER PROPHECY CAME TRUE.

The death of the girls in fulfillment of the prophetic vision of Achsa Walker recalled all the young girl had said and the peculiarities characteristic of her life. She was the only daughter of Charles Walker, a farmer living at Kingston, and the niece of Frank and Dill Joslin, well known at Madison. Maude Moore was the daughter of John Moore, a miller, and was a classmate and life-long friend of Achsa, and, with her, was about to finish their studies at the graded school of Kingston. The two girls, who were both pretty blondes, were unseparable companions, their love and loyalty to each other having been often the subject of the favorable comment by the village people. They were somewhat different in disposition, however, Maude being always cheerful and light hearted, while Achsa was more quiet and profound. She had a peculiar aptitude for story writing, and in each one she wrote was some lesson or moral taught, more likely to come from the brain of one of mature years than from that of a child. About a year ago she began to talk of death, and repeatedly since then she had prophesied that she and Maude Moore, whom she said she loved more than any one else, would die together some time before August 1.

MAKES WILL AND PLANS FUNERAL.

Some time ago little Bessie Fero, of Ripon, was visiting at her home. Achsa was in bed and told Bessie that she was about to make a will. She dictated it without hesitation in a manner which showed she had long thought of it, the style being formal and much after the style of an ordinary will. In it she bequeathed her doll's clothes and play things to her various playmates, dictated the names of eight little boys to act as pallbearers and asked that the Rev. Mr. Babcock, of the Methodist Church, conduct the services. In the will she also referred to the idea that she and Maude Moore would die together. The document was witnessed by Bessie Fero and left in her custody. Later she told her mother that she had made her will, and after the tragedy little Bessie was sent for and the will opened. A week before the accident Achsa was helping her mother make a white dress, which was to be worn by the little girl. Suddenly, after a long reverie, the child said: "This is very pretty, mother, and you can lay me out in it when I die."

KNEW THEY WOULD DIE TOGETHER.

From the first time the child spoke of death her mother and friends remonstrated with her and told her she must not think of such things. She said, however, that she knew she and Maude were to die together and seemed to be perfectly contented with the thought. At the time of the child's death and funeral, the girl's mother was sick in bed and did not see her dead child. The funeral of Maude Moore was held Wednesday morning, and that of Achsa Walker in the afternoon. Every effort was made to carry out the provisions which the little girl had made in her strange will.

A strange feature in connection with the tragic affair was the fact that at the time Dr. Bothwell was building the boat, which later carried the girls to their death, Mrs. Moore, mother of one of the girls, had told him that it was unsafe. "I prophesy, doctor," said she, "that that boat will be a death trap for somebody."

The prophecy came true.

The above illustrates a grand truth in the Spiritual philosophy—a prophecy equal in importance to the one that predicted the death of President McKinley.

What Has Spiritualism Given to the World? An Address By Mrs. Helen P. Russegue, at the Boston Spiritual Temple.

I shall take for my theme this evening the question, "What in Science and Religion has Spiritualism Given to the World in Fifty-four Years?"

It is well at times we turn our attention to the past to observe the milestones that have marked our progress; that we look more deeply into the truths that are being presented to us for our consideration, for our attention, for our uplifting; that we recognize the sources from which knowledge comes to us, the foundations upon which we have been building, as well as the dreams or prophecies, what is to come.

Spiritualism has opened wide the doors whose entrances have been closed to the human intellect.

Dogmatic religion has locked the doors of the Temples of Thought, but the wall is broken, seeking light and truth to know just where to go and how to find it.

It is a remarkable fact that until the intellect of man is appealed to, until thought is awakened, until intelligence is aroused, man stands with folded arms in a quiescent state, not asking whither am I going, or whence have I come.

The world has been moving on; it has been growing more and more profound; it has become sweeter and more glorified, and now it is seeing more clearly than ever before the handwriting upon the walls of time. The mysteries of the world are opening now to the conscious intellect of man.

Science told man long ago how rapidly rays of light might travel by regular vibrations in space; it has marked the progress of the emanations from one point to another; it has told you that light travels from 286,000 miles to 300,000 miles per second; but when the spiritual life of man is awakened, the same science which has marked the march of time, has also brought to humanity instrumentalities by which you are recognizing the powers of the spirit. You are to-day beholding how much more rapidly thought is passing from place to place, overcoming time and space; that the spiritual transmission is more rapid, more direct, more definite, more earnest than the light that has traveled from the distant planet to this earthly sphere. The spirit of man is recognizing its relationship to the world of matter which encompasses it.

Spiritualism has been one of the great factors in the growth of the human mind. It has brought man to a conception of the possibilities of his intellect; it has marked out what man can do—not only what he can do, but what he must do or accomplish to attain the height, or the boundary of the powers contained within him.

The spiritual progress of the last fifty-four years has unveiled greater mysteries than have ever been known in any era of time. It is true that spirit communion, the knowledge of another world, a life beyond the grave, cannot be limited to the knowledge that has come to the world in fifty-four years, for did not Socrates say when asked what should be done with his body, "You may do what you please with my body, if you do not imagine that it is me." Pray, "do what you please with my body," but he did not desire that they should believe that it was the living Socrates, the thoughtful philosopher, the scientific, earnest man.

The world is taking up these truths now.

The pendulum of time has swung out into the universe, and it has swung back into the human thought until the fires of truth are being kindled upon the altars of intelligence, and man is awakening to the possibilities within him.

Spiritualism has diffused itself through the great living mass of humanity. It has scattered its seed broadcast over the world. Its influence is felt in high places and in the lowly walks of life. It is recognized as an omnipresent power that is permeating human society and human associations. It is a power in your midst. It is working through every condition of human thought. It is diffusing itself into every phase of life, of principle, of growth, of that progress which belongs to the human thought.

Spiritualism is but fifty-four years old now in its modern manifestation, yet it is as old as time. It has left its footprints upon the mountains of the past. It has engraved its lessons upon the tablets of time. It has left its impress everywhere, and man has grasped its truths, and is carrying them forward to higher unfoldings.

To-day Spiritualism, speaking of it as a religion, is broader, truer, sweeter, more divine than that which has been vouchsafed to man. It is a religion that is embodied in right doing, that is abolishing fear, that is doing away with error, that is taking out of the lives of the human family the undeveloped conditions, and is awakening man to a necessity of improving all that he possesses; of cultivating every faculty; of uplifting the souls of the world to a conception of a higher need than they have known heretofore. It is the religion of doing; the religion of growing, the religion of advancing, the religion of progress, the religion of the spirit.

Spiritualism has builded a higher spirituality than has been recognized before. The spiritual relationship that exists between man and man, between soul and soul, is more clearly recognized than it has ever been before. How? By the different phases of communication that are existing everywhere in your midst, not only in mental telegraphy, but in mental healing; not only in the two, but by the emanation from every human mind that is recognized in your midst. It is a fact that you are measuring the intellectual vibrations of the human spirit just as you are measuring the vibrations of the air; you are marking their regular and irregular passage through space; you are marking their transmission from one locality to another, and all this is transcending all that has passed before your mind at any earlier date.

Spiritualism is awakening humanity to a true conception of what men are. To-day you are communicating, not what you profess, but what you are to each other. You are speaking a language which has been uttered for centuries, and to-day there is not a chain, a fetter or a bond that confines man, but what is feeling its influence. It is going out and out until it reaches the farthest bounds of life. Its influence is being marked, not only upon your fellow man, but upon all nature. It is carrying its power into homes and hearts that have heretofore been fettered by dogmatic faith.

Spiritualism has come as a destroyer. It has been cutting down error. It has razed the old temple to the earth. It has undermined the old institutions. It has taken away from man the fear that has been imbedded in his heart, and he is now becoming emancipated.

What is the result? Many times, mistakes, errors, sins, it may be, are apparent, but there has never been an overturning of any condition in life but what the imperfections are brought to the surface. There has never been a volcano that has belched forth its fire and lava that has not brought the interior of that mountain to the surface, and so it is with truth. You are the volcano, and in and through you is growing and burning the fire of wisdom, truth, spiritual progress; and the errors that are in your lives are coming to the surface, and you are throwing them off, and you are attaining to higher perfection.

Spiritualism is accomplishing this as a religion. It is teaching man the love of right for right's sake. It is teaching him to do right, not because he is afraid of punishment. There is a love for right doing, and a love for wisdom; there is a love for spiritual growth; there is a love for that which is true and beautiful. It is taking away from you the desire to worship. You bow your heads and prostrate yourselves in the dust before you, and why? Because you are afraid, afraid of the unfolding results of your lives; but Spiritualism tells you that you are to stand erect, live earnest, honest lives; meet the consequences of your own doing; accept the results of your own acts; burn the dross within your lives in the fires of experience, and wash your souls clean, pure and white, in the blood of truth. Let your souls be washed clean and white, because you are throwing off errors.

Spiritualism is marking the difference between right and wrong more definitely than it has ever been marked before. It is outlining the possibilities of the human intelligence, only so far as the human intelligence has developed these possibilities. The moment you have attained to one height, you have only brought yourself to the observance of one beyond, and one truth transcending every other truth is leading you up the hills of time. Progress, eternal progress, for the souls of men. This has been one of the fundamental principles taught by Spiritualism in its modern aspect. It has developed a power that has brought this matter to the thought of every individual in every community, of every family in the land. It has percolated every sect; it has penetrated every circle of society. It has attained to the highest places in the land; it has gone down to the lowest depths of humanity. It embraces one and all. It brings God closer to the human consciousness and makes divine life more closely allied to the lives of men.

In science, Spiritualism sees its inauguration as a fact. It has unearthed many principles that underlie human action. It has not only taught us that we are allied to each other through our sympathies, but that we are allied to each other through our infirmities as well.

We are transmitting to our fellow creatures the wrongs that we are entertaining, just as much as we are letting out the good that we treasure.

We are giving to the world that which may not be seen, but which is most potent in its effects.

You do not see the progress of the flower. You do not behold the vibrations from that flower. You do not know their regularity, nor recognize the parts of it. It is created. You do not know why one is white and the other red until you have analyzed every part and portion of that flower to know what its relations are to its environments; so it is with the human life. You do not know why the wrongs exist in life until you have analyzed the conditions to their depths.

Spiritualism is accomplishing much for the world. It has unearthed the cell of the criminal. It is growing slowly into the houses of justice. It is inoculating its influence in every home everywhere, until we are learning how much it has accomplished for man's good. We are learning something of the foundations of human society, and in this, our Spiritualism becomes an active principle, a reality, a fixed fact in this wise, that there is a divine law inherent in every condition of life whose mandate cannot be ignored, and must be obeyed. We recognize this fact in the world of nature, but we are prone to ignore it in the human world. We are prone to strive to escape the penalty of the law. We are striving to avoid the justice that confronts us; we are attempting to remove from our midst the conditions we do not enjoy, and why? Because the education, the association, the environment of more than two thousand years has given to us a way of escape from all these things, but to-day we are learning to accept what we earn; thus Spiritualism is becoming a practical religion.

Fifty-four years has taught the world that there is a fact in this one assertion, that if life is eternal, justice must crown that life.

It is true that if there is life beyond the grave, it must be for something.

It is not true we are to fold our arms and sing songs of praise until, with wearied hearts, we close our eyes to eternal sleep. No, it means activity, earnest endeavor, love for our fellow men, a close and earnest watchfulness of the needs of all upon whom we can bestow goodness, helpfulness, light, truth, love, sympathy and strength, and leads us to a higher unfolding of our own lives.

Spiritualism has taught us that the same law that applies in Nature outside us in the world of matter, in the world that surrounds men, applies within the spiritual life.

There is no such thing in life as inactivity; there is no such thing as inanimate life; there is no force in life that is quiescent. There is only a power that is marching on and on forever and forever. That power we are giving out in centrifugal force as much as the power that is centrifugal in the world of matter outside of the human mind, and the centripetal is the power that is coming in like a flood from on high into our lives, inspiring us to nobler deeds, to greater responsibilities, to more earnest endeavors, and to a sweeter relationship.

Fifty-four years have taught us that God is justice. His law is eternally just. His power is eternally divine. His presence is omnipotent. His knowledge is the knowledge of all things. His life and truth is the spiritual force that belongs to the universe. This being true, we cannot withdraw from his realm; we must abide within it; we must act according to its mandates; we must obey its demands, and we must march according to its commands.

Spiritualism has not only taught is that man lives beyond the grave, but that he retains every faculty, that every possibility of the mind is carried through the doorway we call death; that he is carrying every thought, the same love, the same tenderness, the same errors that have belonged to him here; until he shall have discarded them, thus progress has left its stamp upon him only so far as he may have awakened to the need of a greater and higher truth.

Spiritualism has taught us that we are not only to commune with the spirits of men who have passed beyond the grave, but we are to commune spiritually with each other; we are to see and hear as we are seen and heard; we are to know as we are known.

It is not the human ear that receives the vibrations of sound, that knows the measure of that sound.

It is not the eye that recognizes the vibrations that are surrounding us from the planets beyond, but it is something within that is measuring that distance. There is a power within that is telling us what these things imply, what they are to us, how we shall use them, how we shall apply them, how we shall appropriate them to our daily lives, and the result is that we have entered into a closer communion, a more earnest and sincere helpfulness to each other, and the world is better for it.

Spiritualism is building for each man a heaven, and he is building for himself a hell.

The fires which he kindles in the one instance are the purifiers through which the dross and ignorance and imperfections are burned away.

The heaven he is building is simply the recognition of a higher condition. Every one who is impatient to move on, aspires to greater heights, is reaching out farther and farther into the realm of spirituality, and the world has attained to that condition to-day, that it confronts us everywhere, in our homes, in our business, in our religion, in all the associations pertaining to daily life that is calling for a greater, a higher need of a spiritual recognition of life. Spiritualists, what does this mean? What does this imply?

Fifty-four years may have emancipated you from one degree of slavery; look to it that you do not enter into another. That has been a great fault discovered in many who have accepted the belief or the knowledge of the existence of life beyond the grave, who do not try to extend that knowledge, to strengthen it, to build it up, to send out its radiance to the world, by which the world may be divinely illuminated, but it is doing its work. It is percolating every church; it is speaking from every pulpit; it is going to the hearts of men; it is lifting man to loftier heights, and it is telling of a nobler future for the race. It belongs to the heart, it belongs to the experience; it belongs to the world.

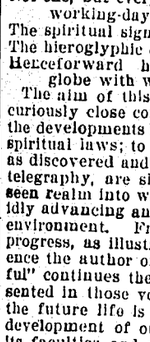
Spiritualism has accomplished much in its half century of life. Its religion is universal; its science is practical; it is not only telling you that you are allied to each other, but it is telling you how you are allied to each other. It is telling you that you cannot sever the ties by which you are held in the great community of life.

Spiritualism, where is it? It is here, it is everywhere; it is not only in the world of matter, in the grain of sand, in the blossom that is pure and beautiful, in the earth which has given to it its strength, in the warmth and sunshine that has gladdened its heart, but it has gone out into the world, and is telling its story everywhere. It is singing of the spirit of living.

What does it mean? It means that you go down into the earth. You are measuring the spiritual nature of the planetary worlds; you are knowing the component parts of the universe, and the time is not far away when you will know that there is a tie so clear and so well traced that you may mark the relation that you hold to a heavenly body.

Spiritualism has accomplished so much in its half-century that to-day there is no religion known of man that does not know of its presence, that does not feel its warmth, that does not experience its power, that is not thrilled by its fires, that is not awakened by its progress, that is not uplifted by its influence, and is not purified and exalted by its divinity. All of this, Spiritualism has accomplished in fifty-four years. Dogma's chains are broken; the cloud of the human soul is passing away; temples are crumbling at the very foundations in which man's soul has been imprisoned, and the world is catching the gleam of an eternal emancipation from wrong, from sin and ignorance, and is catching the gleam of the heavenly truth.

DEAFNESS CURED



By No Means Until "ACTINA" Was Discovered.

Ninety-five per cent of all cases of deafness brought to our attention is the result of chronic catarrh of the throat and middle ear. The inner ear cannot be reached by probing or spraying, hence the inability of aurists or physicians to cure. That there is a scientific cure for deafness and catarrh is demonstrated every day by the use of Actina. Actina also cures asthma, bronchitis, sore throat, weak lungs, colds and headache; all of which are directly or indirectly due to catarrh. Actina is sent on trial, postpaid. THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

CHRISTENING.

Harry J. Moore Tersely Expresses His Opinion.

To the Editor:—Noticing several references, in articles recently published in your paper, to the christening and confirmation services conducted by me here in Chicago, I wish to correct the wrong impressions that seemingly prevail concerning these services. The following is an article written by Rev. Thomas B. Gregory for the Chicago American, June 1; that explains my position precisely in regard to the Christening (christing or anointing) service:

When seen at his home, 773 Sixty-third place, the Rev. Harry J. Moore, the minister who is responsible for this radical departure from the old way of christening children, said:

"The use of flowers instead of water in christening our children is, from my point of view, a decided improvement. The flowers signify upon the part of the parents the desire to have the child's life as pure, bright and fragrant as are the flowers which crown them. It is a pretty ceremony, and, to my way of thinking, contains all the elements of true baptism.

"We are not disposed to quarrel, however, with those of our neighbors who may prefer the old form of baptism by water. They are entitled to their views, as we are entitled to ours.

"The flower is the epitome of all the elements heretofore used by the various religionists in baptism rites, and is, I think, the most significant and modern in its symbolism. As compared with water, the flower is far more real, tangible and human. It gets closer to us. It is more concrete and readable. The water slips away from the hand that grasps it, the flower can be held, and studied, and admired, and loved.

"Furthermore, the theology that has from of old been implied in water baptism seems to me to be false—false and injurious.

"The idea is that water washes away the sins of the candidate's soul. But surely these little children are not sinful. It would be blasphemous to call them so. They are pure and innocent, and might go straight into the company of the angels without hurting the angels at all.

"But take the floral baptism and you have another idea altogether. The idea is that the life of the child should be fashioned after the purity and sweetness of the flower. The flower typifies the ideal after which the child is to strive.

"When the floral wreath is placed upon the child's head it is urged to consider the meaning of the rite. The nature of the flower is explained to the little folks and they are urged to imitate the flower in their own lives—to be bright, not sour and gloomy; to live so as to make the world love them, just as it loves the flower; to be, like the flower, a blessing and a joy, rather than a hindrance or a curse.

"Again, water is colorless, but from the tints of the flower we draw our most beautiful and helpful symbolism. White signifies innocence. And, by the way, if you wanted to show a little child what you meant by a clean, pure life or character, how could you do better than by calling its attention to the spotless white rose or carnation which you place in its hand or put in its hair?

"Red stands for courage, resolution—the thing that wins life's battles.

"Holding up before the eyes of a child a red flower, you say: 'As this flower holds its color—its rich, strong, blood-like hue, so may you in the fight against wrong ever hold your courage. As the flower is red, so you must be resolute and brave.'

"Purple, or blue, stands for the spiritual. It is the color of God's unstained heavens, the color of the great, wide sky which stretches away and away to the infinite, while it leaves behind all that is filthy and low and mean.

"In all these ways, then, do we strain, by help of the floral christening, to reach the children's better nature. We can do it better in this way than we can by the use of water, and that is why we have made the innovation."

Now, as to the significance of the confirmation service. The child is first named by either the parents or friends or some of the relations. It may be that when the child arrives at the age of seven or up to twelve years, it is dissatisfied with the name given it by those closely related to it and if it can offer any real good reason why its name should be changed to the one that it and others interested in its welfare may mutually decide upon, why not give it the privilege of helping to determine the name by which it is to be known? I see nothing wrong in permitting the child to exercise its right of choosing in this particular. We name our dogs and cats and never think of them even thinking of changing their names. Surely our children have more rights than even domesticated animals. Now all there is to the confirmation service is implied in the spirit world confirming the mutually changed name.

In one of the articles referrng to these services it was mentioned that inas much as the writer did not see the date for "holy communion," it was presumed to have been inadvertently left off the program. No, my friend is mistaken in his or her inference. We had no intention of serving bread and wine at this service. I have, however, conducted a service that one might name, "holy communion," but it consisted of communing with our friends both in and out of this expression of life. In other words, by shaking hands and having a general good time with those in these bodies, and by receiving messages of consolation from our dear departed ones. Could there be a more appropriate "communion service" than this?

My motto is, Look after the young! I am certainly tired of seeing Spiritualists send their children to orthodox Sunday-schools. Every child that takes part in the public christening and confirmation service is always in attendance and very punctual in getting to the meetings. I do not see anything in these services to cause one to hold up their hands in holy horror and cry priestcraft! HARRY J. MOORE.

The Ethical Side the Best Side.

When we enter a church that is rightly down to business, that of loving and doing for others, our bosom smites us for any uncomplimentary things we may have thought or said about the church.

When we enter a court house where a man is being tried for giving poor city children an airing on the Lord's day, or for not believing in transubstantiation or the Jericho incident, or because he can't see just how a bad man is made a good one in the twinkling of an eye, our bosom smites us again, but this time for not having said a great many other uncomplimentary things about the church.

But even if we had remained at the meeting-house the smites would have gradually eased up on us and finally subsided when the parson got up and began repeating "sacred" history, and to tell that we must be and do good, not for the sake of those affected, but for Christ's sake, because the Lord had commanded it and to keep our own small souls out of hell.

Every man must commend the church in so far as it is Christian or Christ-like, that is, loving and self-sacrificing in the interests of others. The laugh comes in on the speculative and historical side. A scientific side the orthodox church does not seem to have. And we can't afford to take the ethical side of the church as proving the speculative and historical side.

Neither can we take it that there would have been no good in the world but for the church. There is good in other countries which have not the church, and we may suppose among the inhabitants of other spheres who possibly never heard of the God of Israel nor of Christ. Indeed it is a point abundantly mootable whether there is not more of the damnation which comes of selfishness, to the square mile, in so-called Christian countries, than in Japan or China.

There may have been a time in the history of European and American peoples when it was profitable to believe in the God of Israel and in Christ as his son; and that we must be good and do good for the sake of the son, and to keep out of the hell which the Father had prepared for the wicked. The belief impressed the life and doctrines of Christ, and made many good on compulsion or through fear. And there may be yet many who need this extraneous influence and for whom the theoretic side of the church still serves a good purpose.

But the man who is good on compulsion is not so good as he who is good of his own free will and accord, and some do say he is no good at all. It is conceded that charity given to be seen of men does not argue a good man, nor does it have any reflex influence toward making him good. A parity of reasoning might suggest that the man who is good for Christ's sake and to keep out of hell is to some extent minus the reward, and that the theoretic side of the church in this respect does harm. Anyway, there is a growing suspicion that goodness, like inspiration, "comes always from within and never from without." We should love charity for its own sweet sake; not for Christ's sake, nor yet out of deference to the devil's feeling in the premises.

Of course, the ethical side of the church will never outlive its usefulness, though its speculative side may, as evidently the historical side already has. But a standing objection to the ethical side is that it makes good church-members rather than good citizens. Too much prominence is given church attendance and the contribution of shekels, and not enough to the every-day life of its members. Again it is said by certain ungodly persons that the church itself is selfish; concerned too much about building up the organization, not enough about the welfare of the people. They do say that Sunday laws and some foreign wars are on that principle. Finally, these unthoughted people say the church is both cowardly and selfish; coming down like a thousand of brick on the small sins of small people; touching very lightly on the great sins of the great people from whom come donations, salaries and social position.

"The Religion of the Future." By S. Weil. This is a work of far more than ordinary power and value, by a bold, untrammeled thinker. Important Suggestion.

E. C. Waldron writes from Chesaning, Mich.: "Why not ask through The Progressive Thinker that all Spiritualists, and as many others as see fit, donate for the next ten years one dollar each, to be paid yearly, for the benefit of the Reed City Home, and pledge themselves to do it unless passing out hinders their doing so. My wife and I will do it and if 5,000 or 10,000 will do so, see what would be in the treasury for the Medium's Home. What a blessing it would be, and there is not a person in the United States but that can give one dollar. See what can be done."

The above is a most excellent suggestion. Every Spiritualist who can, who is actuated by humanitarian feelings, should send the following on a postal card to Dr. A. B. Spinney, Reed City, Michigan:

"Dr. A. B. Spinney—Dear Sir:—I promise to pay to you promptly on the first day of each year, as long as it is possible for me to do so, the sum of ONE DOLLAR, to be used exclusively for the benefit of the Reed City Home for Mediums." (Sign name and full address.)

There should be at least 10,000 Spiritualists in the United States who are actuated by a benevolent spirit. Send in your promise at once.

Always in the Lead.

To the Editor:—Your large free notice in your valuable paper has called out many pledges and some money. It is a right move in the right direction, and I think will do more than anything else to bring in permanent funds. YOU are always in the LEAD!

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

The authorities at Prague, Austria, have condemned a man to pay a fine, in addition to undergoing a week's imprisonment, for practicing Spiritualism. The Governor-General has issued an order that in future persons taking part in Spiritualistic seances will be sent to prison without the option of a fine.

C. S. Hyatt, of Unadilla, N. Y., writes: "Find within postoffice money order for the renewal of The Progressive Thinker. I am now in my 81st year. I subscribed for your paper before the first number was printed. I have never missed a number, and as long as I live I must have it. You are doing a glorious work with your free library."

Dr. George N. Hilligoss, president of the Indiana Association of Spiritualists, who has large interests in Anderson and Madison county, Ind., is disposing of his property as rapidly as he can find buyers and expects to take up his residence in Cincinnati after the close of the meeting at Camp Chesterfield. Dr. Hilligoss sold two farms of 80 acres each in Stony Creek township, Madison county, last week, realizing good prices.

John Oakley writes from Hackensack, N. J.: "The Progressive Thinker is like manna to my hungry soul, and I thank you most heartily for sending me a sample copy. I have in my library several of your valuable premium publications, and the reading of the books and the paper has made me wise unto salvation! Knowledge is the savior of mankind."

The last service in the old auditorium at Camp Chesterfield was held Sunday, June 22, the lecture being delivered by Secretary Smith of the Madison Avenue Spiritualist Temple, of Anderson, followed by Mrs. Maggie Vestal with platform trumpet tests. The old auditorium was built twelve years ago. The new auditorium will be dedicated Sunday, July 20, by President Barrett of the National Spiritualist Association. Vice President Chamness, of Alexandria, the first vice president of the Indiana Association, when it was organized twelve years ago, presided at the meeting Sunday. Only a few of the members of the original board of directors still survive. Among these are L. O. Edson, of Hartford City and George Runyan, of Muncie. Another of the members of the association passed away at 9 o'clock Sunday morning in the person of Emily, widow of Carroll Bronnenberg, of Anderson, who also died only a short time ago. The case of Mrs. George, who has been sick at her cottage on the camp grounds for more than a year, is attracting much attention. Mrs. George has not partaken of food for forty days and is wasted to a skeleton. She is carefully cared for by her daughter, Mrs. Ella Phipps.—Muncie (Ind.) Star.

Correspondent writes: "Interesting meetings are being held every Sunday evening in Haymarket Theatre Building, 161 W. Madison street. Dr. Burgess' psychometric readings, together with Mrs. Maggie Waite's tests, are drawing together large audiences of people who had never before given Spiritualism a thought. Sunday evening, July 6, there will be an interesting christening service, conducted by Mrs. Waite, after which she will give her usual demonstrations, assisted by Dr. Burgess, who is well worth hearing."

W. W. Aber writes from Spring Hill, Kansas: "I desire to state to the readers of The Progressive Thinker that I have cancelled all camp engagements for this season on account of the work going on here. I receive letters daily from persons, asking what camps I will attend. Persons desiring to visit Spring Hill will do well to write me before coming."

Prof. W. W. Kretz's experiment, at Reading, Pa., in which he allowed himself to be buried last night in a box under six feet of earth while he was in a hypnotic condition, terminated abruptly this morning because of the heavy rain. After he fell under the hypnotic influence exercised by himself and was buried he was to have remained under guard until to-night, but when the rain storm set in after midnight the vicinity of the professor's grave at the fair ground was deluged. Those on watch became alarmed lest the water should enter the coffin and the hypnotist be drowned. When the storm showed no sign of abating at 8 o'clock this morning, the watchers summoned assistance and the coffin was unearthed. When raised to the surface it was found that the water had already begun to soak into the coffin. Had it been allowed to remain in the ground a few minutes longer its occupant would undoubtedly have been drowned. Kretz, though somewhat wet, was still sound asleep. He had controlled his influence so that he would not awake until the specified time. Half a dozen members of the Berks county society of occult science exerted all their influence to arouse him. After three hours' work he partly revived, but he was in a sort of stupor all day.

Rev. B. F. Campbell, pastor of the Second Methodist Episcopal Church, Dover, Del., had a dream on Monday night, which seems to have been a foreshadowing of the events of the week. Mr. Campbell dreamed that he stood between two coffins and preached a funeral sermon to a sorrowing congregation. One of the caskets was placed in front of him and the other back. He told his dream to some friends and was well twitted about it. That afternoon Mrs. John Waller, a prominent member of the Second Church, was burned to death, and the funeral had been set for to-morrow. The body of Blanchard Smith, of Wilmington, formerly of Dover, will be brought here to-morrow for interment. The Wilmington man's funeral will be held first, and while Mr. Campbell preaches that sermon the body of Mrs. Waller will rest in her home, which is situated back of the church, so that the minister will be standing practically between the two coffins.—Philadelphia Inquirer.

Mrs. Mattie Ward writes from Geneva, Ohio: "Dr. W. O. Knowles, of Grand Rapids, Mich., served the First Spiritualist Society at Geneva, Ohio, at its hall, June 22. He is a fine inspirational speaker and a good test medium. He has many friends in Ashtabula county. He has served the Conneaut and Ashtabula societies and assisted at Kingsville and Andover. He possesses ordination papers from three different States—Michigan, Illinois and Ohio."

Last night at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. John F. Myers, 924 West Front street, a little circle of Spiritualists held a seance, the media being Mrs. Skeeles, of Onarga. The latter had the leading part of the meeting in charge, and through her a lecture was given and exhortations presumably from various spirits. The believers in Spiritualism urge that conclusive proof of the genuineness of the theory lies in the fact that while Mrs. Skeele is an uneducated woman, some of the spirits talking through her use the best language and the purest diction. This was especially true of the lecture and the closing talks. The seance conducted by Mrs. Pemberton was what is called trumpet speaking. This was done in a dark room, the trumpet having been laid on a table, and the circle having joined hands in order to complete a circuit. A number of voices were used through it, some of them being whispers and others clearly intonated. These were usually of short duration, and gave names which were familiar to the ladies and gentlemen present. The address and other talks given through Mrs. Skeeles was given in plain light. The meeting was conducted by having sacred songs interspersed throughout the visitations. To those present who were not accustomed to the seances there was a weird sense of the sincerity of the members present and a longing to know how the dark seances would look in daylight, an utter impossibility, the medium says, if the spirits come.—Bloomington (Ill.) Pantagraph.

Moses Hull's appointments are as follows: July 11 to 18, Lily Dale, N. Y.; 19 and 20, Middlefield, Ohio; 22 to 27, Wonewoc, Wis.; Aug 2 and 3, Hicksville, Ohio; 5 to 12, Lake Pleasant, Mass.; 14 to 31, Waukesha, Wis.; September 6 to 14, Los Angeles, Cal. Address as above, or at Lily Dale, N. Y., until August 12, then at Whitewater, Wis., which will after that time be his home and permanent address.

Frances E. Finch writes from Evanston, Ill.: "A great interest is being manifested in Spiritualism in our beautiful city of Evanston. The Psychical Research Society has held a large number of public meetings during the past three months, and many well-prepared and celebrated mediums have been with us. Our local circle meets regularly for development, and our results are very satisfactory. Tuesday evening, the 1st inst., twenty of our number assembled at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. James Hope, 2014 Lincoln street, at a materializing seance, given by Mrs. C. B. Bliss, of 3141 Indiana avenue, Chicago, which was attended with remarkable manifestations of spirit return, which is having a tendency to convince and convert some of our friends who formerly believed that earth-life was the end of existence, but now have changed their views. We also invited Miss Elsie Hornbeck, who has recently come here to reside, and Mr. F. M. Stoller, speaker and test medium, of 763 Monroe street, Chicago, whose presence and assistance was an inspiration to all our friends."

Mrs. F. Koehler and daughter will visit Lily Dale this season.

F. Corden White, the well-known medium, has lately been united in marriage to Miss Effie D. McKerrow, of Arcadia, N. Y. We extend our hearty congratulations.

Enters a Denial.—W. B. Wagner writes from Topeka, Kans., as follows: "I desire to correct a statement made in an article published in your issue of July 5, and signed 'An Investigator, Topeka, Kansas.' That article purports to give the reason why Mrs. Laura B. Payne was dropped from the program of the late meeting of the Kansas State Spiritualists Association. The following language is used: 'The objection to Mrs. Payne was solely for the reason that she took a decided stand against trickery in mediumship.' I was one of the executive committee that arranged for the meeting in question. It never occurred to my mind to bar Mrs. Payne for the reason given by 'Investigator.' All earnest Spiritualists are against 'trickery in mediumship,' and for Mrs. Payne to be against it certainly did not lower her in the estimation of the committee. What, then, was the reason that the committee did not put Mrs. Payne on the program? Because she had denounced one of our local mediums as a fraud and failed to furnish any evidence to sustain the charge."

Dr. A. P. Conant, formerly of Boston, Mass., magnetic healer, inspirational and trance speaker, is engaged at Summerland Beach camp-meeting, and would like to engage for other camps. Terms liberal. Address 48 West Rich street, Columbus, Ohio.

C. V. Schmidt writes from Milwaukee, Wis.: "Max Hoffmann has just concluded a successful three months' engagement with the Unity Spiritual Society, and has made hosts of converts to the cause, and gained many personal friends as well. From here he goes to Clinton, Iowa, Marshalltown, Iowa, and thence to Lincoln, Neb. The prejudice against Spiritualism in this community is waning, as can be seen by the fact that although we regularly hold two test socials weekly at the homes of members and friends of the society, the attendance has ranged from 50 to 78 persons."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley concluded her engagement at Jenison Park Camp, July 4. She is now serving the people of Genoa, Ill. Her next camp date is at Briggs Park, Michigan, from July 17 to 21.

Correspondent writes: "Mrs. E. J. Demorest is again in her native city, and in her honest and genial way is doing a good work for the cause in Allegheny and Pittsburg, Pa. Mail addressed to 300 Bissell street, Chicago, Ill., will be forwarded to her."

Geo. W. Uhlich writes from Mansfield, Ohio.: "Mrs. M. Bartel, the phenomenal medium of Cripple Creek, Col., has certainly proved to Mansfield people the truths of spirit return, and succeeded in lifting the vail that separates this life from the beautiful realms in which our spirit friends await our coming. Nature has been lavish with her in bestowing spiritual gifts, as she possesses more phases of mediumship than I ever before thought could be possessed by one person. A most beautiful incident occurred when a young lady from the spirit world played upon a guitar which had been her own in earth life, while her father, a member of the circle, sang one of her favorite songs. Joshua Depey, 'the grand old man' of Mansfield, received a written message from the spirit world, signed 'Frank,' requesting him to write an article for The Progressive Thinker. Mrs. Bartel could give us but three seances on account of her engagement at the Nebraska State Camp, but when she returns next fall she will be surprised to find the seed which she planted, to be developed into a ripened Spiritualistic harvest. In conclusion, I wish to applaud Hudson Tuttle's address at Cleveland, especially that part entitled 'The Perfect Man.'"

Dr. B. O'Dell writes from Paw Paw, Mich.: "We have just closed a two weeks' camp-meeting at Bankson Lake, including three Sundays. While our attendance was not large, those who did attend were well paid for their effort. The first Sunday and until Wednesday, Dr. P. T Johnson, of Battle Creek, in his own characteristic way entertained the people and his work was well received and appreciated. The lectures by Mrs. M. L. O'Dell, of Paw Paw, on Thursday, Friday and Saturday, were very highly complimented. H. L. Chapman, of Marcellus, drew an appreciative audience the second Sunday morning, and his poems, the third Sunday, were thought to be fine. Mrs. Augusta Ferris, of Grand Rapids, gave a very able lecture in the afternoon of the second Sunday, and her message work was considered good. From Thursday of the last week till the close of the camp we had that old pioneer and veteran worker in Spiritualism, Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y., who gave us many excellent thoughts from his masterly mind, which were well received and were very instructive. I also wish to speak of the excellent work done by our musical director ,Mrs. Minnie Reid Marvin, of Lansing, Mich. The music was truly of a high order and far above the average and her smiling countenance and winning ways commands the esteem of all. We have certainly spent a very profitable and enjoyable two weeks and I truly hope that all camps this season will have as pleasant a time."

FROM THE N. S. A.

The Mediums Home Philanthropic Work Begun.

As secretary of the National Association, I feel it is about time to publicly make another report concerning the progress of funds for the Reed City, Mich., Home for Mediums, and to also tell what we have been doing to help some of the worthy workers of other days, in their efforts to keep the "wolf from the door." On May 14, I stated that the fund had received $411.41, and that the proceeds from the benefit seance by mediums of Chicago, would about swell the amount to five hundred dollars. The exact sum received gratefully, from Dr. G. B. Warne and the mediums of Chicago, was 89.75. Since that report, we have received for the fund, the following donations: Sarah Nichols, $2; W. C. Dougherty, $1; E. P. Upton, $9; Mrs. S. A. Manning, $1; seance at Baltimore, Md., per Ed Wright, $3.60; A. Fisher, $2.50; W. O. Purvis, $1. The following list sent by Dr. Spinney, must be included here: Mrs. C. L. Rich, $5; M. A. Banett, $5; Mrs. Margaret Graves, $5; Chas. J. Fisher, $1; Mrs. Helen Waters, $1.

Dr. Spinney has also personally pledged one hundred dollars, over forty of which he has paid in sanitarium work for one of our good mediums.

The grateful thanks of the N. S. A. board are extended to all of the above generous donors, and to all who have in any way contributed to this fund for the relief of mediums. But it will be seen, that we are very far from having money enough to build the Home itself, that is so needed in our ranks. Therefore, this matter of establishing a Home by the N. S. A., is held in abeyance, until some definite plan for raising the requisite means is not only formed, but carried out. Although the two philanthropic men before referred to have concluded not to withdraw their offer of fifteen hundred dollars jointly, the outlook for maintaining a suitable home, after it is ready for occupancy, is not encouraging. As before stated—see former letters—the N. S. A. board has decided that while it is waiting for funds to open the Home at Reed City, to use what money it could command for the purpose, in aiding as many mediums as possible, who are in need of substantial aid towards their support. To this end, it has already entered the human work of paying the sum of $12 per month toward the support of four former well-known workers in our ranks, one of whom is the once prominent Henry Slade, of other days. All of these mediums are aged and deserving; one is totally blind, one is nearly blind but hopes to regain her sight; and one is, in her advanced age, made destitute, because she has given so much time, strength and money to other needy souls. These cases are all well authenticated. They are mediums who have done a long and faithful work for humanity on both sides of life, and now in the stress of their need, the N. S. A. is satisfied to aid them to its utmost power. Two of these mediums live in the East, Dr. Slade is in Michigan, and one lady is an old-time resident of Chicago. As the three lady mediums are sensitive about being called objects of charity, we withhold their names from print, but we are ready to satisfy any friend as to their identity and worth, who will write us for that information.

Thus has the good work of the N. S. A. Mediums' Relief branch begun. Not only this, but Mrs. Carrie Fuller Weatherford, who has recently passed to the higher life, was placed in the sanitarium of Dr. Spinney, at Reed City, by the N. S. A., where she received the most tender care and treatment, for nine weeks, and then, as she wished to pass away from her home, among her loved ones, she was taken home under the care of one of the Doctor's good nurses, all at the expense of this N. S. A. project for aiding mediums. This is not a work of charity; it is only a recognition of the good work done by our mediums, who need not feel sensitive about accepting the aid thus bestowed. But unfortunately, we cannot aid as many as we ought, in this way, for lack of funds, and it will not be possible to add to the list without further contributions from the friends who love true mediumship, and who owe so much of their happiness and knowledge to Spiritualism. Furthermore, this present fund can only be utilized for the benefit of aged or sick mediums who have labored for the spiritual cause through so many years, that they have become stranded by exhaustion and the approach of age. We trust that the contributions of friends will continue to come in, that we may add to the list of those who are to be cared for as mentioned in this letter, from the N. S. A. Mediums' Relief Fund. With cordial greetings to all,

MARY T. LONGLEY,
N. S. A. Secretary.

RELIGION.

It Is a Fact, a Force, a Truth.

Religion was born of truth. It originated with the earliest human sentiment that proclaimed the reality of a mighty, all-controlling, universal power and intelligence. It was felt, not understood. This religion was man's relation to this power. In the absence of better knowledge fertile imagination was the color bearer. The supernatural was the easier explanation. Nature study was beyond their unfoldment. It is now known that this force was part and parcel of Nature. Science was the discoverer. Man now has a natural religion instead of the supernatural.

Some of the strongest and most forceful spiritualistic mind is yet floundering in the transitional stage. It is resting. It needs the rest. Let it alone. The future is a very long period. Nature can wait. Refreshment comes at last. One of the finest hits the N. S. A. made was when it struck out an Infinite Intelligence. All nature is bristling with her own Infinite Intelligence.

Science located religion. The scientist was the first to realize his relationship to the all-wise Infinite Intelligence of nature. A noble brother would as soon part with his beautiful sister as would the scientist with the religion that connects him with the warm throbbing heart of ever kindly nature.

The great damage done by the primitive expression was that it interdicted and placed a ban on nature investigation. Man is not the greatest thing in nature. If he were he would be greater than universal nature.

As to "Science, supplemented by an exalted morality, the Bible of the future;" it is eminently true. The object of a bible is to interpret the occult. No system of knowledge does this so well as science. Herbert Spencer says science is more metaphysical that metaphysics itself, if that were possible. Many cultured mortals and many polished spirits haven't yet learned this. They still linger on the priestly idea that science is limited to cold dead facts. Feeling is back of all thought, and nature is back of all feeling.

Lily Dale Camp.

To the Editor:—As nothing has appeared of late in your excellent paper from Lily Dale, I would say to your many readers who may or may not contemplate coming to this camp this season, that in all the past, Lily Dale never offered a greater variety of charms than will be found within its hospitable gates this season of 1902.

The grounds are in perfect order, under the management of our genial superintendent, Mr. Witherell. The Hotel Grand has been thoroughly renovated, paper and paint being unsparingly used, and every means possible—both public and private—have been taken to promote the comfort and pleasure of the expected guests.

The lakes, the island, the hills and the valleys are perfectly charming. The writer having sojourned here since the beginning of May, knows whereof she speaks, when she says this will be an exceptional year in point of interest to all who will visit the camp.

The beautiful souvenir Cassadagan, containing the programme for 1902, can be had by writing to the assistant secretary, Miss Kate O. Peate, Lily Dale, N. Y. This is one of the strongest programmes ever given at Lily Dale.

Since the meeting in June the camp has presented a lively appearance, rainy weather to the contrary notwithstanding, showing it to be a centre of attraction even before the camp proper begins. The Moses Hull School has added quite a quota of students to the population, and every trains adds more to the number who are rapidly taking possession of the cottages. Texas, California, Ohio, Pennsylvania, Canada—in fact, people from everywhere are already here, and I would say, Do not be afraid of being lonesome if you come to Lily Dale.

Michigan's Northern Resort for Spiritualists.

At Snowflake station, between the two towns of Central Lake and Bellaire, about 20 miles south of Charlevoix, is the Spiritualists camp-ground, in a nursery of many varieties of evergreen trees and other shade trees on the banks of Intermediate Lake.

As it is between Petoskey and Traverse City, in the resort region, it is easy of access on the daily trains, going and returning the same day. We wish that all Spiritualists who intend to visit northern Michigan would send us their names and addresses for a camp program, and that they would visit our camp during August. We wish that northern resorters favoring our cause would also favor our camp-ground as a resort, helping it to grow.

By the generosity of Mrs. Ruth Eastman, of Mancelona, the camp has a lodging and eating house. If any one else could assist us a little, we would all be thankful. The camp is a sure thing. If any reader knows of a Spiritualist who goes to the northern resorts, we wish you would help us by sending names and addresses.

OUR RESPONSIBILITY.

A Plea for Truth and Truthfulness.

The responsibility on the recipients of the nineteenth century revelation is not a light one. So divine a truth as is the demonstrated continuity of life and inter-communication between the two states of existence, makes necessary perfect honesty of word and deed. There is in it no place for the trick of a competitive state of society or political intrigue—no place where false colors may be hoisted.

The Spiritualists of to-day may be grouped into three classes. First, the iconoclastic, whose aim is to be aggressive, whose delight is to wound and kill. Life is a continuous cultivation of combativeness and destructiveness. Spiritualism's divine lesson is ignored. This lesson has been automatically worded through the mediumship of Sara A. Underwood, as follows:

"The attitude of convicted believers in spiritual life towards the blind leaders of the blindly dogmatic in spiritual matters, should be that of the seers to those yet in the dark, as full of loving-ness and tenderness as one who sees to those bereft of sight, eager to remove their disability, but patient with their natural mistakes and halting steps. Remember as they are, so once were you, and they, too, shall be ultimately led to the light."

Another class live in what they know to be true.

Knowledge, savior of my soul,
Let me to thy banner fly!

Content in communion with the loved departed, they deem it a sacrilege to teach old error as any part of Spiritualism.

Yet another class are only satisfied by bringing into the work the flesh pots of a by-gone servitude—those things of a crude long ago that had their birth in the world's primitive darkness. A widely prevalent illustration of this is the use of the Lord's prayer as a ritual in trumpet circles. What an opportunity for educating the public in Spiritualism is here lost! Why not substitute for it something up-to-date? If ethics are wanted, here is one:

I will reflect before I speak.

I will not argue at length on differences.

I will strive to keep reproach from voice and manner, regardless of what another may have said or done.

I will utter no personal remark that may tend to make another uncomfortable or unhappy. I will not unpleasantly comment, condemn or criticise save for friendly analysis.

I will strive to be positive or reflective to all evil, and negative or receptive to all good.

I will strive to forgive every living creature, holding enmity towards none.

I will refuse to listen to any one who may say unpleasant things of others, of themselves or of me, for other than helpful purpose.

I will avoid everything that impairs my self-respect, and will ever and always aspire to a more spiritual life; to this end I seek communion with those who have gone before.

Or perhaps the following combination of ethics with service might be better liked.

We come with gratitude untold to this communion sweet; of heaven we take a newer hold when you we come to greet.

We leave earth's falsehood and its sin through this a love divine; we bring to you clean hearts within, all that our souls refine.

Dear angels, here we seek your aid, with a devotion true, to gain the wealth that does not fade, which makes the heaven for you.

Oh, precious ones now gone before, who once like us did creep among earth's shadows blind and sore, in sorrow long and deep, you know our needs, departed souls; give to us as you may, while on we journey to our goals where shines progression's day!

Or possibly the shorter invocation:

We come our promises to keep with an affection true and deep. In faith we trust the words you spake to meet when we conditions make; we know you will not slight our call, from o'er death's tide your words will fall; we know that you will come to bless us here who tread earth's wilderness; we trust your promises to keep with an affection true and deep.

We pray you unto us draw near. O, come to us in waiting here, our promises with you to keep in an affection true and deep! We know that you cannot forget the happiness on earth you met, that time nor grief can ever dim or mar this glad reunion hymn; for when the soul from earth doth leap it holds affection true and deep.

We certainly do not need leaders who are with the church, Christian managers of our camp-meetings or evangelical conductors of our seances. There is a propriety to be observed if we respect ourselves. It is not all of Spiritualism to succeed financially, irrespective of the means to success. The tactics of Christian science should not be ours, with a Christianity repudiated by Christians and a science by scientists. Such titles may catch small fish and mammon-seekers, but they are not fitted to truth-seekers; and had our Christian Spiritualists been true to name, they would now be known as Spiritistic Christians. Spiritualism needs no prefix nor addendum.

We are all proud for the intellect and oratory of our one and only Moses; but Spiritualists can mistake the identity of modern with ancient Spiritualism for Spiritualism itself, whereas it is only one of its many branches. For the reason of this identity many call themselves Christian Spiritualists, who delight in the titles and ceremonies pertaining to popular errors. Others may not agree with our views, but they always respect those who respect themselves; and it does seem absurd for those who have received this demonstration of a continuity of life to go back to such a mess of pottage as is found in the popular regime. The Christian Spiritualist may not be aware of loving self more than truth; yet all efforts to engraft the old on the new but helps the church to absorb this cult, as history shows she absorbed temperance, anti-slavery and every reform that has blessed the world, notwithstanding her opposition when she would have welcomed it. To meet her aggression with solid firmness and at the same time treat her devotees with loving kindness, is the work of the hour for Spiritualists.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

M. C. G.: Q. (1) As a rule can one be helped by mail by "absent treatment?"

(2) How can one overcome lying reports of pretended friends?

A. (1) There is a grain of truth in "absent treatment," for the mind (spirit) can be projected to indefinite distances, as has been proven by facts carefully collected. But for one mind to so project itself and be felt by another mind requires the closest sympathy, and intense desire on the part of the spirit thus manifesting at a distance. The variety of such occurrences shows the difficulty, and the facts show that only in cases of great stress and need is it possible. For one to advertise a wholesale system of curing disease by "absent treatment," having a host of patients, so many that he cannot even hold their names in mind, is charlatanry of the most unmistakable kind and not only a fraud on those who are duped, but a blight on what is really true.

All that there is, can be, in such pretense is the belief of the patients that they will receive assistance. The "suggestion" is helpful, and that in ratio of the reposing faith.

The true magnetic healer can exert his genuine spiritual power only through intense desire and fraternal, unselfish love to free others from suffering. The moment he departs from this for selfish ends, he loses this power, and whatever success he may have, comes from other causes.

(2) Drop such "friends" out of your life, and remain silent. Your conduct of life alone can answer. You cannot catch a lie. It will run around the world while the truth is buckling on its shoes. After all, why should you grieve because one you thought a friend proves false? We are not living for others but ourselves. If we know our own motives are right and pure, it may be a pleasure to have others understand, but not essential to our happiness. The slanderer, the false-hearted in the end harm only themselves. The soul given to falsehood, is the foul goal to which all falsehoods come. It is an old adage that the traveler who stops to stone barking dogs never gets to the end of his journey. The captain who awaited a smooth sea, or vainly attempted to beat down the waves, would not navigate his ship over the seas. He makes the adverse wind swell his sails, and the anger of the waves drive the buoyant ship to its destined harbor. So can we make advantage of the falsehoods of pretended friends, and gain strength by the obstacles their envy or anger throw in our path.

It may cost a pang, a tear, to find faithlessness and brutality where we expected refined sympathy, but it will pass as a shadow of a cloud. There is a universe of sunshine for every cloud, and we ought to be so well balanced and sustained that we would be sufficient for ourselves, if alone in the earth's domain.

I. W.: Is Flammarion yet a Spiritualist?

A. Twice this great astronomer has been heralded far and wide as having renounced Spiritualism. The first time it was a baseless falsehood. The last there was the slight occasion of his having justly condemned some spurious manifestations which he had at first accepted. In a letter to the editor of the Banner of Light, he expresses his firm and unshaken belief.

He has never recalled his declaration: "I do not hesitate to affirm my conviction, based on personal examination of the subject, that any scientific man who declares the phenomena denominated 'magnetic,' 'somnambulic,' 'mediumistic,' and others not yet explained by science to be 'impossible,' is one who speaks without knowing what he is talking about."

M. C. H.: Q. I have in my life, like every one, many things to regret, yet my spirit friends say to me that I have nothing to answer for, as I have been controlled by fate which led me, and hence I am not responsible. Is this true?

A. The doctrines of "free agency" and fate have been the subjects of contention from immemorial time, and engaged the earnest efforts of the greatest thinkers, and yet there has been no reconciliation. The dogmatic view leads to free will, free agency, a necessary interpolation to the scheme of man's redemption. The scientific views of modern thought leads to inexorable fate.

A plain statement is that man as he stands to-day, is an evolution from the world of beings beneath him; more, is a condensation, a centerstance of them all. Thus far a creature of circumstances a foot-ball of fate. Now thus fashioned and complete, through his mind he becomes a controller of conditions, a law unto himself, and able to avoid, to change, to make available the forces of nature. Especially is he free in the domain of spirit, and while yet fettered by his inheritance, he may look forward to complete emancipation from the influence of the past and present environment.

But in this state of partial thralldom, we cannot excuse ourselves by saying that such is the decree of fate. We are held responsible to the last farthing.

Isaiah Williams, W. D. Allen: Q. Did Sergeant Cox become a Spiritualist, or only testify to the phenomena?

A. Those who accept the phenomena as genuine are in popular estimation Spiritualists. Sergeant Cox investigated carefully and continuously, and while guarded in expressing his conclusions, did so unmistakably. He did not engage in the organic extension of the cause, except by his connection with the Psychic Research Society, which of course worked on scientific lines.

Q. Who is Thomson J. Hudson?

A. He is author lecturer, government appointee, and all-round man, who gained all his notoriety by his books on "Law of Psychic Phenomena," and "A Scientific Demonstration of the Future Life." The latter is a demonstration that befogs, and of the former it may be said, that there never was a more cumulative mass of assumption resting on assumption, or a "scientific" book so absolutely devoid of the scientific spirit. As an original observer he has no claims, and his style is that of a lawyer making a plea with the determination of gaining his case, rather than the calm, and well balanced discrimination of the seeker after truth.

He was born in Windham, Ohio, 1843. Resides in Washington, Add. 10, 9th street, S. E.

WAR AND PIETY.

Emperor William Speaks on Religion.

The great German Emperor William made a great speech to his people on the subject of religion at La Chapelle, Prussia. His ideas of religion are of warlike nature, yet in line with popular religion and its God of wrath. He says: "The mighty German army constitutes the support of the peace of Europe."

That is, we understand, the peace of Europe depends for its existence alone upon the German army; or, in other words, the Christian nations of Europe are held to keep the peace through fear of "the mighty German army." Perhaps the other powers do not view the situation in that light and do not recognize said army as anything more than one of the factors.

The world could get along fairly well without "the mighty German army," which is only an impediment to human progress. The object of an army is to fight, and Emperor William's peace is not the kind of peace the world needs. A peace promoted through fear of a well equipped army is scarcely compatible with the true significance of peace. If all the armies were dissolved the world could have peace of the right sort.

"It must not be forgotten," says William, "that the empire is rooted in simplicity and the fear of God. I look to all to help me spread religion among the people in order that the German name may preserve its health and strength. This applies equally to the two creeds, Catholic and Protestant."

The empire being rooted in "the fear of God" accounts for the existence of "the mighty German army," which is calculated to perpetuate the memory of Jehovah, the god of wrath. We cannot say how much "fear of God" there is in the army, but we can safely say the spirit of war is a part of Christianity, justified by the Holy Bible and illustrated among the Christian nations.

The religion Emperor William calls on his subjects to help him spread is Catholic and Protestant—two systems squarely opposed to each other and each claiming supremacy and holding the name Christian. If all restrictions and restraints were removed they would do some bad things to each other on account of their differences in creed.

For propaganda the Catholics depend on recruiting their ranks from infants, by holy baptism, soon after they are born, before the little ones can raise any objections or offer any resistance. There is no need of spreading religion in Germany—it is spread there too much already. But William wants to spread it abroad by aid of his army. The Chinese have a correct understanding of the kind and quality of religion that the Germans spread abroad. They have had painful experiences in that line.

Emperor William said: "It is with pride and joy that I am able to tell you what the Pope said to my special ambassador, who went to Rome on the occasion of the holy father's jubilee: 'That he had always kept a high opinion of the piety of the Germans and the Emperor and the German army.' A word of praise from the Pope of Rome is highly prized by the rulers of Europe, and he can say anything to flatter a man's vanity, when it is to his interest to say it; and the nicest thing he can do is to tell a man he is good or pious. In this case the flattery had the desired effect, whether true or false, so that William with pride and joy told what the Pope said. He put it on strong. Not only the Emperor, but to the nation and the German army he gave credit for piety.

We don't understand what the soldiers of an army have to do with piety. It is out of their line of business. They are educated and drilled in the arts of war, to fight and kill people, and hold themselves ready to march at the word of command into an enemy's country to plunder and murder the people, and devastate their land. How does all that accord with piety?

But perhaps the Pope was not far wrong, when we look at the definition of the word piety, which is "Zealous devotion to the service of God." In this sense an army of soldiers may serve God forcibly and effectually through the arts of war; because, when we look into the Holy Bible and learn what is the character of the Christian's God and see how he figured in war, robbery and murder, we perceive that piety is attributable to the employment of an army. Perhaps the Pope had this idea in his mind in his statement to William's ambassador. Moreover, this opinion is confirmed in view of the operations of all Christian nations through their well equiped armies and navies. Taking all these circumstances into consideration, we are compelled to admit that the Pope of Rome is about correct in attributing piety to the German army and nation. Therefore, let it be agreed and understood that soldiers are pious. A. H. NICHOLAS.

FAREWELL MEETING.

Mr. and Mrs. Hull's Last Sunday in Buffalo.

On June 29, Mr. and Mrs. Hull concluded their four years of ministration with the First Spiritual Church, of Buffalo, N. Y. It was a stormy day, yet the down-pour of rain did not prevent the people from gathering at the Temple.

Mr. Hull's work of the morning was on behalf of the young; his discourse from first to last, was an earnest appeal that parents who are Spiritualists, should consider the importance of proper Sunday-school training. He emphasized the thought, that if Spiritualism was the best system for adults in the way of teaching human ethics, it was the one system, above all others, that should be taught to the children.

The lyceum was called immediately on the adjournement of the morning meeting. As the last session of the lyceum for the season was held on that day, a special program had been arranged. The hour was late when Mrs. Hull took charge of the exercises, therefore the regular routine of work was abandoned. Mrs. Hull addressed every pupil separately, and at the close of her remarks, presented them with a copy of Mrs. Twing's late work, "Jim, or Touched by an Angel Mother." She referred to the valuable lessons contained within the book, and expressed the hope that every member of the lyceum class might sometime know by actual experience, what was meant by the touch of an angel.

Four of the pupils, Marie Niehr, Walter Starr, Alice and Willie Dillon, had expressed a wish to be christened as young Spiritualists before Mrs. Hull left them; accordingly an especial message was delivered to them, in which the term, to christen, was explained. She asked that they might become endowed with the power of the good spirit, that from that hour, they might feel an inspiration for the love of truth, and a desire to learn of spiritual things as never before. She said: "We use no water in our little service; but the flowers; they are symbols of beauty and love, like the atmosphere of your own dear souls."

The next thing on the program was the rendering of excellent selections—Alice Smith and Marie Niehr; their work would have done credit to older readers. The last number on the children's program was a lovely little poem, designed for a parting word and tender prayer for Mrs. Hull, their former lyceum conductor. The words were spoken with a trembling voice, and the eyes filled with tears. The little girl was unable to complete the poem; Mrs. Hull seemed as deeply affected as the little girl who had knelt at her former teacher's feet and attempted to give it. At this point, Mr. Henry Hanson, a former trustee of the society, and for more than a year, a leader in the lyceum, arose and said he felt he had a message to give the people. He referred to the work of the lyceum during the past four years, and urged the friends to resolve to give it all the encouragement possible when the school opened in the fall. He referred to the teaching of the orthodox church as related to children, and drew a contrast between that and the teachings of Spiritualism. He then turned to Mrs. Hull and said he had a pleasant and yet a sad duty to perform—pleasant, because he desired her to know her work of the past four years in the lyceum was appreciated though she had given service without material recompense; he was sad when he remembered it was the last Sunday she would be with them. He then presented her a beautiful diamond ring. He said: "We present this to you, because we feel it is an appropriate gift—one you can always carry with you as a reminder of your friends in the lyceum and the church. You will see the words, 'B. C. P. L.' are engraved in the inside of the ring." With a few appropriate words, after making the presentation, he took his seat.

Mrs. Hull was overcome with surprise and emotion. She could not speak for a moment; when enabled to do so, she said in substance: "I cannot tell you how much I thank you for this beautiful testimonial; I do not feel worthy of so much; I accept it with the wish that we may truly live as though we know that life and love are as endless as this golden circlet. May the spirit behind all our hope, and love, and work, become as bright as this burnished metal, and when we enter the other world, may our souls be worthy of a setting as beautiful as the one that holds this jewel."

At night, every chair in the audience room of the Temple was filled. The platform presented a beautiful appearance, the tables were covered with choice flowers, the farewell tributes of loving friends to the departing workers.

Mr. Hull's evening discourse was prefaced by a text found in Phil. 3:13: "But this one thing I do; forgetting those things that are behind, I reach forth for the prize of our high calling." It was an instructive and impressive effort from beginning to end; the almost breathless silence on the part of the audience during the delivery, gave evidence that the words of the speaker found their way to the souls of the hearers.

Prof. William Lockwood was discovered in the audience before the opening of the evening's exercises and invited to the platform. He was warmly welcomed. At the conclusion of Mr. Hull's discourse, the Prof. was called on for remarks; he responded much to the enjoyment of those present.

The work of the day concluded with congregational singing. The selection was from Mrs. Hull's songster:

"We will not say farewell,
For kindred lives will blend;
And in true friendship we shall dwell
Though parted friend from friend.

"We part, but friendship's chain
Our soul's shall firmly bind;
In spirit we shall meet again
And sweetest comfort find."

After the congregation broke up, Mr. and Mrs. Hull exchanged the last good byes with their friends, and left the Temple with none but pleasant memories of their four years' work among the Spiritualists of Buffalo.

WANTS TO KNOW

About Material and Spiritual Science.

To the Editor:—Doubtless there are multitudes of fairly intelligent, earnest people throughout this fair land, who have outgrown and discarded the empty and unreasonable dogmas of the churches, and are hungering and thirsting for spiritual light and life.

We, the common people, are, in this life, an overwhelming majority. We want to know all that is for mortal to know of our relations to each other as spirits in mortal forms. Many of us have starved on orthodox husks, and groped in orthodox fogs, without one true ray of light on our pilgrim journey. Who is to show us the better way? Send out an army of such teachers as Mrs. Ella Wheeler Wilcox, Hudson Tuttle, our honored Editor and a few others who, when we ask for bread do not give us bones and stones of a hair-splitting theory of spirit life. Give us teachers who will tell us what they know and how they learned it. We do not at all believe in splintered egos, the fractions thereof quarreling over the ownership of a poor decaying specimen of human mortality; it is too childish.

We do not, for the same reason, believe that two minds occupy our poor heads, and that the animal one is the more important one of the twain. We do not believe there is an unfathomable mystery about such cases as Miss Fancher, the Watseka wonder, and other so-called complex personalities.

We believe that somebody, sometime will make it clear to us that such cases, also such as Dr. Enos, Miss Elliott and young Devere are only latter day demonstrations akin to those recorded in the old book so many of our latter day wise ones have such a deadly horror of.

Some of us have reasons, solid as the eternal hills, for our beliefs and disbeliefs. In the simplicity of our verdant natures we sat in negative, passive, silence, inviting and waiting for the spirits to bring to us all there was for us, and were taken at our word literally, to our great amazement and consternation. Physical nerves gave way till our inner ear—our spirit ear—was reached and we talked face to face—were forced to talk with some of the denizens of the unseen realm.

The right to control was surrendered to a shrewd and polished spirit and we were entered into judgment with. The tale is too long to repeat here, but we know by a white hot experience that the story of the Wanderer in the Spirit Lands is not a fiction. By the same rule we know that evil obsession is possible and not uncommon, and that mortals attract spirits like unto themselves.

Oh, in what dire need are we, the people, of wise instruction along these lines.

Permit the giants, the tall sons of thunder, away up on the peaks of the Mount of All Wisdom the exalted privilege of firing at each other their wordy array of glittering generalities, but give, oh, give us, the hungering multitudes on the lower levels, the spiritual things for which we hunger.

Just a word more, please. A much quoted and lauded "scientist" in a recent essay refers in a classical way to the "flippant looseness," "mental tangle," "pseudo science" scribblers. He lays down this unchallenged proposition: "Science is only the method by which knowledge and truth are established." Also: "Man is not a scientist till he demonstrates truth."

He then proceeds to brand as "flippant looseness" the statement made by an obscure writer that "spiritual science differs from material science as widely as spiritual things differ from material things."

He then informs the befogged bankers after old theologic rot that: "The philosophic intellect of twenty-four hundred years ago declared the spirituality of all elements and substances of which matter is composed, and the affirmation has never been disproved."

Fellow talkers in, up and through a "vacuum," please take notice, this scientist from his supernal perch has rendered a decision from which there can be no appeal.

Matter is spirit and spirit is matter. If there is a distinction matter is the more spiritual—since, "In exact language, there can be no such thing as material science."

After all, Mrs. Eddy, the goddess of Christian Science, is the only true God, and the mission of Spiritualism is closed out and become a thing of the past.

Possibly a few moss-backs may continue for a time to think there is a difference between spiritual and material things.

A mortal may journey from Salem, Oregon, to New York by steamship or railroad and return. That such journeying can and has been done is a demonstrated fact. A scientific fact. Is it a spiritually or materially proven fact?

If hypnotism has demonstrated anything it has proven that the spirit man may be temporarily released from his mortal form, make a trip to New York or any other point and return in a few minutes.

How does the spirit man make the journey?

The proposition for scientific solution is, how did he go and come? "It is up to you," Mr. Scientist. The mode of the going and coming of the mortal man is clearly understood; the manner of the spirit's journeying is an unexplained mystery.

Possibly there is a difference between spiritual and material things.

Salem, Oregon. J. RIGDON.

LOVE.

I locked the bars around him;
I cried, "Ah, no! Ah, no!"
Love would be free—alas for me—
I could not have it so.

I bound his wings and braided
A prison of my heart;
The prison broke, for freedom spoke—
I felt my love depart.

Oh! weary was the morning
And heavy was the night,
Black was the sky—it could not die,
Though dead was all delight.

At last to love I whispered,
"Go, darling, you are free!"
He shook his wings, "free" of things,
Then flew straight home to me.

TO THE VANQUISHED.

Though the days may not fulfill
All thy hopes, have patience still;
For, perchance, to-morrow's sun
Sees thy happier days begun.

No endeavor is in vain;
Its reward is in the doing;
And the rapture of pursuing
Is the prize the vanquished gain.

SPIRIT LIFE, NOW.

Message from Frances E. Willard.

To the members of the Frances E. Willard Circle, Greeting. Dear Brothers and Sisters, you have so generously responded to my request for members for our circle, that I find it too much of a tax on the strength of our medium to write personal letters to all, therefore after responding by letter to the application of every new member, informing them of our simple conditions, we will, with the kind consent of its Editor, address you through the columns of The Progressive Thinker. We are highly pleased with the success, so far, of our present endeavor to promote home circles, in which to manifest the power of spirit communion, to promote spirituality, fraternal love, and add to the health and happiness of humanity. There are thousands of good and advanced spirits interested in this work, giving health, and development of mediumship to our members, and if you follow our directions you need not fear obsession, as each mortal member is guarded by wise and intelligent spirits, from the ignorant and undeveloped, who love to control humanity and through its instrumentality satisfy their unnatural lusts.

Since our last meeting one sister has written as follows: "Dear Sister in Spirit, Frances E. Willard, and all the members of the F. E. W. Circle, in the material body and spiritual body, greeting. To all the children of earth, especially the earth bound, peace and love. I remember the noon hour concentrations, and try to do all in my power to uplift humanity. Last night, the one set apart for our sitting, passed without anything unusual, as you know, dear, I have so many to make comfortable, and to do for, but "all things work out well to them who love God." By eight o'clock all the helpless ones were in bed, and everything peaceful. The first half hour I passed in thoughts of health, physical and spiritual, for each member of this circle. I could plainly sense the healing vibrations, which I sent out again on wings of love. The last half hour I devoted to developing. My guides may find me dull in that line, and think they have a bad bargain, however, I will give my time, and earnest thought, to the good work, and will strive daily and hourly to become more spiritual, so I can come "nearer my Guide, to thee, nearer to thee." My one desire has been for knowledge and power, for the uplifting of humanity. Oh "hasten the day when their faith shall be sight, their creed be rolled back on a scroll." May the angels of light over guide us, onward and upward."

Dear sister, as you read your letter here, forgive us for publishing it, which we feel you will do. It gave us pleasure to receive it, and we will say right here to all our members of the F. E. W. Circle, anything you write for us, addressing it to our medium, we will surely receive, and your communications will receive kindly attention. As you perceive, the good sister who wrote the above letter received much benefit from her first sitting in our circle.

Dear brothers and sisters, there are many of our kind, both in material and spiritual life, who can be greatly benefited and uplifted by our thoughts. We ask not for your money, and only a small portion of your time, but we do ask you to be liberal with your thoughts, that have power to strengthen your weaker brethren, that all may be temperate, well and strong.

Remember the noon hour concentrations, and that in unity of thought there is great strength. Our circle is like a street car, in one respect, there is always room for one more; but unlike a street car, it is never crowded. So all who wish to join, send in your names and addresses to our medium, to whom it is not given to know the end of this work.

Another sister has written: "I have just finished reading that sweet message, in The Progressive Thinker, and it does me so much good. I am a believer in this grand truth, but have only The Progressive Thinker to comfort me; there is no one of our belief that lives near me. I am very mediumistic, but my home surroundings are such that I cannot progress much in my development, as the spirit will see. She offers to help those in need, and I kindly ask her to let me join the F. E. W. Circle."

Dear heart, we gladly give you welcome. There is no type of home in America or abroad but what we knock at the door and ask for admittance. We seek not to desecrate the home, but to bless it and make it possible for those who have passed out of material sight to be cordially welcomed in the home circle. Our medium has frequently lamented the fact that she was the only mortal Spiritualist she knew of in her town, and she wished, oh, so much, that she could have the privilege of sitting in a developing circle, little realizing that all things are possible for Good. Now without any additions to the Spiritualists ranks in her vicinity, she finds herself the mortal center of a large circle meeting every Thursday evening. What is nine, ten or a thousand miles to a spirit. Not one of you need complain for the want of a circle. Come go with us, and we will exchange mutual good. There is no home so bright but what it can be more brightened by the addition of a home circle; there is no home so desolate but what it can be restored by spirit power, aided by mortals. Open the door and let us in, and we will do you good.

Another sister writes: "I am so pleased with your message. I had a sitting alone. I felt so happy, and had several little manifestations. I am a widow, have three daughters and a husband in spirit life. I am so happy in this beautiful religion. I have been about four years investigating. If I had only come into this beautiful light sooner, I would have been further advanced."

Dear sister, your husband says that he has been in spirit life but a few months; that he is called into this circle for development. The girls are with me. I know that you often feel as if you had been called to drink of the bitter cup of sorrow to the very dregs. But if you can only feel and realize that we have not gone so far away from you but what we can return at will, and it is a helpful pleasure that you recognize our ability to return. You are doing all that can be done, and when the labors of earth are finished for you, we will all be reunited in a realm where there will be no parting, and our souls will develop and progress together to a more perfect realm rightly named Heaven.

Hoping to hear from you all, I am your loving sister,

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I had communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD
A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.

By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a now birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

LOVE AND LAW.

The Material Should Be Subordinate to the Spiritual.

Love is the life-force of existence—the creative energy in nature. Without love procreation would cease, and does cease where it has been subordinated to mere mechanism or commercialism, though the cause or motive may be a search for the happiness, which love promises as its reward. But nature does not operate for such effects. It does not seek love or happiness, but produces it in its creative energy—imparts it as a causative force per se—and has so installed it in the human entity, its individualized expression.

Man is in miniature what nature is in universality, and is moved by love to follow her example. Any unprovoked exertion on his part, evoked by physical or mental stimulation, converts the natural love impetus into a fictitious appetite or false desire not consistent with nature's higher impulse, and reduces love to a materialistic basis—a force or principle having a lowered spiritual vibration in its procreative energy, with effects compatible with the cause—less spirituality and as much more materiality as injected by stimulation. The principle is the same as invited by a provoked appetite for taking in food. It creates a higher material vibration than the normal and craves repetition. Passion is the result of catering to the latter; and passion as a ruling element in the human spirit, adds to the material until all spirituality ceases to exert any influence whatever on the life forces of the individual.

"Total depravity" may not be an absolute condition into which a man can sink, but it is very annoying to find himself controlled by a nether influence of any kind, when the light of a higher existence has touched his soul and he resolves to reform or retrace his steps toward that light in order to sense or feel it as well as knowing of its existence.

Thus it is with the absolute or positive of love—the natural or spiritual rapport with it.

Having sought it materially or sensually, and not found it, he now craves its higher impulse or as nature imparts it.

The soul's desire, of course, puts its spiritual end, or what is left of it, into motion. But when one portion of a force or principle is moved, the whole vibrates; and its greater part is most consciously sensed in the vibration.

Love materialized by deceit, selfishness or otherwise, naturally manifests in this vibration, and the reformer has to overcome what is termed "temptation."

Sub-consciousness or the knowledge of knowing right from wrong, with moral force or the will to resist, is the religion needed in this event. Self-denial or purity of action, charity, benevolence, truthfulness, honesty of purpose, are the agents which lift the reformer out of his dilemma, and add to the spiritual impetus of the force until it is equal in volume or potency to its opponent, whatever its special craving or ruling power.

As intellectuality or gathering truth is the opponent of sensuality, and humility or modesty that of arrogance or false pride, so is unselfishness the opponent of those impulses which only vibrate to please self.

Inspiration is the reward or result of curbing the sensual; a potent will of stamping out false pride or arrogance; and contentment or happiness (soul tranquility) of rooting out selfishness, whether it concerns the pleasure of the body, the delights of the mind or the cravings of the heart, where the soul itself is centred, and therefore called soul passions, though not so in fact.

The soul per se cannot become contaminated, thus there is no total depravity. But it can become so environed by unspiritual vibrations or forces that its own impulses partake of the nature of these forces, making it appear as though they came from the soul, which has cast this reflection.

The soul is the so-called divine spark of nature, and represents consciousness, will-power and love in unity—the triune principles of nature denominated omniscience, omnipotence and omnipresence.

Man is nature's individualized expression—passed through matter to unfold a spirit-body to retain this individuality after death.

His struggle for existence and attending results are natural consequences of his connection with matter. He has all the principles inherent to forge a personal consciousness; to overcome the influences which his material relations inherit, and to find the happiness intuitively or instinctively sought by the soul.

Reason has taught him from time immemorial what is right; experience has aided him; inspiration or revelation has led him to higher eminences; and love has moved him to nobler deeds, law, order, government, sacrifices, faith and hope for immortality.

His abuses are not nature's fault. She has done her share in placing him. Man must do the rest; and as "there is no death," a higher experience is awaiting him.

If a higher material than spiritual vibration governs him upon his entrance in the next life, his relationship with matter must naturally obtain until reversed.

What provisions exist for this constitutes a philosophy in itself, for all spirits are subjected to conditions allied with their personality—character, needs, tastes, desires, governing impulses or virtues and vices.

Those that vibrate in unison with spiritual nature are freed and happy according to the surplus of spirituality they have brought with them. Those who have a more active material than spiritual vibration find themselves en rapport with material nature corresponding to the force of their impulses or desire for the earthly.

All are "weighed in the balance" according to this state of their being.

Law places the individual by natural impulsion; or, it may be said, he is attracted to his abiding place by the operation of this law, whether it be to his old haunts, new ones of the same order, or spiritual centres where his counterparts are congregated.

He will find his level, whether above or below his mortal abode, and whatever his station or influence has been in the body. References are stamped in the spirit. Thus there is no prestige beyond the individuality. The spirit world is a natural and lawful sphere, where justice abides in fullest measure, and no one need fear death who has an easy conscience; for love is the ruling influence, and welcomes its own as it vibrates in unison with itself.

ARTHUR F. MILTON.

The Music of the Sun.

Years ago, oh! so many, I placed amongst my treasures the following lines. Dear Progressive Thinker, can you not grant them a little space to-day and allow the beautiful idea to again shine forth for a new and younger generation? They also show, it seems to me, that the sweet twin sisters, Science and Spiritualism, were softly singing, even then, in the hearts of the clergy, for these lines were from the pen of "Rev. H. W. Warren," whoever, or wherever, he was. What a grand and sublime field he opened to my mind and imagination, for those were the days of my youth. Little wonder I have loved, and watched, and all but worshiped the stars since then. No wonder a love for music is the gift of the gods! Let the lines live again, I pray you, they may serve as a golden key to unlock, for the youth of to-day, some of the wonders, the marvels and glories of that mystery, the great Creative Force, to which man applies the word—God.

"Light comes in undulations to the eye, as sound to the ear. Must not light also sing? The lowest tone we can hear is made by 16.5 vibrations of air per second; the highest, so shrill and fine that nothing lives 'twixt it and silence,' is made by 38,000 vibrations a second. Between these extremes lie eleven octaves. Not that sound vibrations cease, but our organs are not fitted to hear beyond that limit. Were our ears delicate enough we could hear up to the almost infinite vibrations of light! Were our senses fine enough we could hear the separate keynote of every individual star! Stars differ in glory, and in power, and so, in the volume and pitch of their song, we could hear not only the separate key-notes, but the infinite swelling harmony of these myriad stars of the sky, as they pour their mighty tide of united anthems in the ear of God!"

Wonderful must have been the melody (could mortal ear have heard), when the morning stars sang together. Believe you, that any spirit sphere is capable of hearing these sublime songs of the stars? We all know "sunshine,"—they say the stars are suns—then for a moment hold the tho't—shall we ever hear the "sun-songs?"

The sun's sincere admirer, in shine and song, RALPH DOUGLAS,
San Antonio, Tex.

WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles, the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Read His Valuable Book, "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You this Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored had traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing, and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

A UNIQUE HUMANITARIAN.

Abraham Slimmer, of Waverly, Iowa, Scatters Riches to Make Others Happy

WILL LIVE IN A WOODSHED—HIS PALATIAL HOME TO BE A HOSPITAL, AND A REFUGE FOR AGED PERSONS—LESSONS FOR THE WEALTHY IN HIS BENEFACTIONS.

Men have paid millions of dollars for an idea that would bring them more millions, but Abraham Slimmer, a resident of this town for the last thirty-five years, and the wealthiest man in this part of the State, thinks he has solved one of the greatest problems of the time in devising a way to get rid of his millions. He is giving his money away. Recently he gave $5,000 for a lying-in hospital in Chicago, with the provision that the people of Chicago would raise $10,000 more. "I want to see if such an institution is needed," he said, "and to what extent the people will back it; there will be plenty more money for it if it is needed."

Last week Mr. Slimmer gave his $50,000 home in this city to the Sisters of Mercy for a hospital and an old people's home, and is preparing a little room in the woodshed, where he expects to live for the remainder of his life.

FOND OF THE OLD PLACE.

"It will be plenty of room for me," he said. "I would move away altogether, but I am fond of the old place, and I shall take care of the grounds for the sisters and make their garden for them. I am a good gardener. I shall have my own hot water and toast for breakfast, and my tea and hard bread for supper, and at noon I shall have dinner with an old friend in the town who used to live with me, and whose wife kept the house for me. He would be offended if I should not go there to dinner every day." And the old gentleman talked about his new plans as a schoolboy would.

But any one would be wrong to think the old gentleman's philosophy was that of personal ease and contentment and a desire to spend his declining days in retrospection.

"I am preparing to go into business," he said to a representative of the Record-Herald. "I have a good deal of money to give away, and I am finding it a far harder task than it was for me to earn it. Of course I can throw it away, and have done with it, but I shall not do that, hence I am preparing to go into the hardest business of my life, and every minute of my time will be needed for my new work."

CAREFUL IN DONATIONS.

Not many weeks ago Mr. Slimmer had a letter from one of the largest and richest Chicago hospitals asking him for a donation to help raise a debt. In reply he wrote the following characteristic letter:

"Dr. ——. Dear Sir:—I am in receipt of yours of recent date, to which I can say I have not the least doubt that the needs of your hospital are as you say, but knowing, as I believe I do, that the needed facilities in this case will be provided without my leading off, as you suggest, I have decided that the cause of humanity will be best served to use my means where, without them, worthy efforts will not materialize, or at best will linger in the embryonic state.

"To me, it matters not what good channels I encourage, but I would not be doing the right thing to relieve an able constituency from doing its duty, which it will do when aroused to the necessity of the hour. It is my duty to become well satisfied that I am not simply parting with my means where they will be properly used, but where the effects of my participation will bring results which cannot be otherwise obtained."

"Now these people will get along," Mr. Slimmer said in discussing the letter to-day. "They may have a struggle, but the hospital will not be abandoned, and its good work will not suffer. What I must do is to start a work that without me would not be started.

MANY BEGGING LETTERS.

"Begging letters?" he repeated in answer to the question. "Yes, I get thousands of letters of all kinds—letters asking me how I work my charities; letters telling me that I ought to have a helper, and winding up with some good woman, offering to marry me; others asking for donations for every conceivable purpose; some offering me money for my work.

"But it is not through letters that I find out what to do. I go into a town attracted perhaps by a little item in a paper. I say nothing, but find out things. One time I went into a town, and found there was an old women's home where the inmates were placed two in a small room that had to be chalked across to keep the occupants from quarreling. They asked me to buy a quilt, as they were having to make and sell things or close the institution. I refused to buy the quilt, because I could not see any good that money would do, but I hunted up the richest man in the town and told him that if he and his neighbors would raise $50,000 I would give the same. He laughed at me, and said the thing was utterly impossible; that they had been trying to raise $1,500 for two years and had only half of it. I talked to him for half an hour, and he gave $10,000 himself and got the other $40,000 in twenty-four hours.

"I have seen men"—the old gentleman travels fast when riding his hobby—"I have seen men actually dyspeptic, as though all their money lay on their stomachs; I have seen them disgusted with the world, sour, and always trying to get more money, like the toper who tries to get sober on more drink. I have taken hold of them and talked to them—I am an excellent physician in that kind of disease—and I have cured them, set their stomachs in good order, made them sleep well at night, like a child; I have changed the sour scowl into a smile and a good word for all the world. How? By getting some of their money off their stomach and out of their way.

"I remember one man that I fairly had to besiege, but I finally got $5,000 out of him and it cost me $20,000. After that he began to take an interest in the little work he had contributed to, and he actually annoyed me with letters offering me more money. He was cured and he could not find ways to get the rest of his money off his stomach and out of his head fast enough. Men that never knew a happy day in their lives, since they had money, I have cured, and they have died almost poor, but blessing me for telling them how to be happy."

TALKS OF ROCKEFELLER.

"Rockefeller is a fool," he said; "there he is giving millions to some seat of learning one day, and the next day he gets it all back again by raising the price of coal oil, the people's light and fuel—always striving to make more money to make him more trouble all the time. They say he has lost his hair and teeth, and that he has dyspepsia and can't sleep. I wonder if it is grief because he is coming to realize that he can't take his millions away with him when he goes. And they say he is a good Christian, too. Well, I am not a Christian and not a religionist of any kind, but I can tell Rockefeller what ails him, and I can cure him, if he will let me handle his pocketbook for a while, and he will die blessing me, after I have spent his money. Yes, Rockefeller is a fool, and is one of the greatest paupers I ever knew."

Mr. Slimmer has been called the "Carnegie of the West." "Carnegie?" he says; "ah, I wish I could go into a town and say to the people, 'Vote me a million and I'll give you a million.' He goes to a town council and they cheerfully vote a million of other people's money for a library. That is all right, but it won't bring Carnegie the happiness he is trying to buy, and he can build all the libraries the world can use, and more, and unless he gets down to the true life and relieves distress and suffering, and sorrow, and humiliation, he will never be satisfied and will die a pauper—a pauper in everything but money."

DRAWS HIS OWN CONTRACTS.

The old gentleman reached from the shelf in his desk a large package of formidable looking papers. He glanced over them as a miser would over his deeds, mortgages and bonds. "These are my contracts with hospitals and old people's homes," he said, "and I drive hard bargains with them. My conditions are exacting. I draw my own contracts; I never allow a lawyer to do it. They would fill them with law. I fill them with facts, and often the boards of directors of the institutions I aid employ lawyers to try to break down some of my conditions and fool me into waiving some of my rights, but they never do.

"Now here is a contract with an old people's home; I gave them $50,000, and they raised the same amount. Here is a clause that they shall not ask any inmate to attend worship. The reason? Suppose a Catholic priest wants to have worship in the institution; if the old folks are asked to attend they may not like to refuse, and as old folks are often quite bigoted in their religion, what is said might offend them. They will know that the service is to be held, and if they desire they will attend. Here is another clause which says that one inmate shall not pay more than another. Each is to have what he or she needs, and it shall cost the same for all. I will not have an aristocracy built up among my old friends which is sure to hurt the feelings of those who cannot pay for what some one else gets.

INMATES FEEL AT HOME.

"If we are to help them, can we do it better than by making them feel that that is their home, and the money which supports it is their money? And the miserable, contemptible verses that are so often seen pasted on those contribution boxes, 'Giving to the poor is lending to the Lord,' and the like! At every turn they are reminded of their poverty.

"Here is a contract with a hospital; I gave them $50,000 and they at first raised the same amount, when a few weeks before they told me they could not raise $2,000 to keep the little hospital they had from being abandoned. Later they raised another $50,000, and it is now a rich institution. My conditions were hard, and they fought me for months over them, but they feel differently now. I provided that the building should cost $25,000 and the remaining $75,000 should be placed in a permanent fund, which I named after the widow of the ex-governor of the State, solely because she was a good woman. She had not a dollar to give. Then I provided that every patient who had no money should be paid for at the rate of $7 per week, out of this permanent fund. If there were no poor patients they got none of the fund.

"Now let me tell you why I did that. I went to Chicago one day to look over a hospital which had asked me for help, on the ground that they were doing much charity work. I found that the charity patients had an average stay in the hospital of thirteen days and two hours. Later I visited the Sisters of Mercy Hospital in Dubuque, where the charity patients were paid for by the city. I found there that the charity patients had an average stay of over five weeks. On a closer inquiry in Chicago I learned that the sick poor were hustled about from one hospital to another, and everywhere were turned out as soon as possible, and often long before they were well. I wanted the hospital to have an incentive for keeping the poor as long as they were too sick to help themselves.

"Then, again, I found often that there were men and women who preferred to die outside in the abjectest poverty rather than feel their dependence on charity. In providing that fund it was possible for the hospital people to make them feel that they were actually conferring a favor on the institution in coming there. Why? Because it would get no money unless it earned it. So these poor fellows were made to feel good about it, and were correspondingly happy."

OTHER PLANS IN VIEW.

Mr. Slimmer will not talk about what he does except in the abstract, and then only because he wants everyone to know his ideas of how to be of service in the world. He will name no beneficiaries, either in the past or in prospect. "I have many plans," he said, "but I shall not talk about them, except to tell you my views, and I shall be glad to have my ideas published, because that may be of service in helping both the rich who have money to give away, if they but knew how, and the poor, who can be made so much more happy by its means."

Who is he? His mail contains letters from all over the world every day. Almost every letter is a blessing or a footprint toward a blessing. Ask the first man one meets on the streets of Waverly, and he will tell you "Mr. Slimmer is the best man in these parts. What! You don't know Mr. Slimmer? You must be a stranger in this country."

Ask the Catholic priest as he goes on his rounds of the sick in the town. "Mr. Slimmer!" he will exclaim. "Why he does more good in the community than all of us combined; he tells me that my religion is a humbug, and then he gives a $50,000 home with eight acres of the most beautiful ground to the sisters."

Ask the preacher. "Why, Mr. Slimmer tells me that Protestantism is another name for hypocrisy, but he goes away and gives $50,000 to start a nonsectarian hospital or a home for the friendless."

MADE HIS MONEY FAST.

"How did Mr. Slimmer make all those millions in a little town like this?" you may ask a business man of Waverly. "He made it by hard, shrewd work," he will tell you. "He bought, fed and sold cattle; he bought and sold land, and he was in the lumber business. But he was a clear-headed, close bargaining business man, and if he buys or sells anything to-day he will make it a business engagement; that is a part of his creed."

"I am of Jewish origin," he said in answer to the question, "but I do not follow the Jewish religion. I am a single man. That is also a part of my philosophy. Those who say they marry because they conceive it to be a duty and bring children into the world for the same reason are hypocrites. That is enough on that subject. I was born seventy-three years ago in Germany, and for the first seven years grew as any other child. For the next seven years I was sent to school and learned to sing hymns about God and the Emperor. Then I came to America, lived for a few years in Illinois, and came here, where I have lived ever since. I have made a lot of money. Everything I did seemed to make me more money. Now I would not step across the street for a million dollars unless it was to give it at once to the poor. I want no more of it. A room and $3 a week are all that I want personally. I do not believe there is a man living who will say that every cent I have ever made was not made fairly and with every consideration for others."

CARES LITTLE FOR DRESS.

Mr. Slimmer is now, as he says, 73 years of age, but he looks fully as young as the photograph indicates. He is a small man, perhaps 5 feet 7 inches, and weighs 130 pounds. He is inseparable from his hat and never changes the style. He cares little for dress and wears a $12 suit, with old-style boots. Besides his "work" his hobby is old people and old friends. Among the latter he numbers "Turk," as rascally an old horse, grown fat and sleek on the best the land affords, as one will meet in a day's journey.

Mr. Slimmer has many plans for the future. He has just begun to give money away, he says. Some of his plans concern Chicago; he will not discuss them except in a general way. But wherever he goes, and whatever he does, it may be taken for granted that some conditions will be maintained.

"I do not make hard and fast conditions with the sisters," he says, "because they devote their lives to their work, perform the labor of the institutions with their own hands, and can make an institution pay, where salary-drawing people would fail.

"I do not make hard rules with Jewish institutions, because I have found that, as a people, they are charitable and broad-minded in their charity, and they take pride in maintaining a high standard for their charges. I looked very carefully into that before I aided the old people's home in Chicago, and I can trust them. But the Protestants are mostly hypocrites. They are the ones who have hired lawyers to cheat me out of some of my conditions, and they have some selfish purpose in view when they work for a charitable institution, and many of them use their religions as a part of their stock in trade. I make close bargains with them.

"I will not have women in the directories of the institutions I help to start—I do not care for a few, but I will not have them given any part of the management of affairs. They are sympathetic and emotional, but they cannot do anything without getting up factions and quarrels, and they put their personal friends in fat positions if they can. And last of all, I will not give anything to institutions that can get along without me. I prefer to start something myself—something that would not be started without me. I can find enough to do even with all these conditions, so my business will not suffer for want of patronage."—Chicago Record-Herald.

Many people would classify Mr. Slimmer as a downright crank, of a peculiar pattern, but all will concede that there is a wise method in his peculiarities, devised to accomplish beneficent purposes. Here is a man who is neither Catholic, Protestant nor Jew in religion, but broader than these, he kindly, generously, lavishly, gives of his abundance, to aid worthy humanitarian enterprises under the care and control of each and all these religions, only making stipulations that shall hold them to his beneficent purposes.

Somehow it makes one wish that Spiritualism had just a few Abraham Slimmers. Then our Medfums' Homes and other humanitarian projects need not go begging for much needed assistance, only to meet with beggarly responses for most worthy objects.

Abraham Slimmer finds far richer enjoyment and happiness in thus bestowing generous benefactions upon those who are needy, than he found in amassing his worldly wealth. Whether he be Jew or Christian or Atheist, may his tribe increase. X-RAY.

THE WAVERLY HOME.

A Letter from the President of the Veteran Spiritualists' Union.

To the Editor:—Your past generosity in allowing me space in your valuable paper in which to acquaint our people with the needs of the Veteran Spiritualists' Union leads me to boldly offer a more musical theme. If I seem able to write of nothing but the V. S. U., I am free to confess I see nothing in Applied Spiritualism more important than the establishment of permanent means with which to meet the needs—growing needs of our worthy laborers. After I had once settled down into my place in Spiritualism for which my soul, unconsciously to me, had been reaching through the years—having seen to the establishment of my own religious home on steady growing lines of service, there seemed nothing of more consequence to me than the solution of the problem of our worn out and overworked servants, and when I learned of the V. S. U., it seemed the best instrument with which to work for this purpose. The little discouraged group that stood as representatives of this organization appealed to my heart as guardians of a trust, rather than the remnant of a marauding band. I cast my lot with them and their trust became mine. In the second year of my connection with them the voting members saw fit to make me their nominal head. When this work became my special care, as president, the responses to our appeals were so disheartening we were led to feel our proper place was with the house-girl who was given permission to go home for a few days in answer to a telegram telling her of her mother's illness. She was urged to return as soon as possible. A week passed without a word, then came a letter saying:

"Dear Miss Blank:—I will be back next week, and please keep my place for me. Mother is dying as fast as she can to oblige Nannie."

But somehow we could not desert the old lady. In her name was centered the hopes and prayers and offerings of a decade. We read the record of her earlier services when, living in a less ambitious way, the many fed from her hand the country over. Her mortgaged house, wherewith the ambition to serve the better she had burdened herself, became our homestead encumbered; to neglect her interests were cowardly parricide. We rallied—and to-day Hope is a constant guest and Generosity a frequent visitor. Let me give you an illustration: A few weeks ago some representatives from the leading societies in and near Boston organized a small body of Volunteers and arranged for a lawn party at the Waverly Home, ten days later. As has been demonstrated in this country before, the "Volunteer" may distance the "Regular" in record-making. Besides a harmonious day of perfect beauty spent at the Home, when every living blade and sheltering leaf on the Waverly acres fairly beamed with welcome and good cheer, there was a net return to the treasury of upwards of seventy dollars. Pardon me, Mr. Editor, if this sounds mercenary, but money is the next thing needed to open the Home for permanent work. It will come—it will come, my brother, but the sooner every center seeks to serve as it is able, the sooner will permanent help for our needy be established.

Saturday, July 19, through the generosity of the Onset managers, the Union will hold services in the camp grounds for the benefit of the Union. Already the program promises to be rich with the offerings of able talent. My friends, shall this prove a memorable occasion? Shall we make it rich in benefits to the V. S. U., our common charge; rich in Onset's history of "reasonable service," and ever memorable in the history of Spiritualism's self-sacrifice? It is for you and me, dear reader, to determine.

"You see how large a letter I have written unto you," but I desire above all things that we nobly and generously meet this demand we lay upon ourselves when we accepted the fruits of consecrated mediumship and became debtor thereto, and I want your growing family of readers to rejoice with us in what is already accomplished.

IRVING F. SYMONDS, pres.

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

Brief Notes on Various Subjects.

With the rest of the world, we of the Pacific Coast sympathize deeply with the British nation in their sorrow for the illness of their uncrowned king, Edward VII. Nothing so illustrates the growing knowledge and practice of spiritual concentration, as these universal, national movements of thought waves of our time. They were not possible until time and space were done away with by the latter day methods of communication.

We rejoice at the apparent improvement of the present focused thought of the world, sure that we are still ruled by the Universal Omnipotent law, that was, and is, and will be.

While the people of Chicago are under the impulse of a forty miles an hour gale, with a driving rain to match, we are bathed in the clear light that reminds so forcibly of the Celestial City, of that wonderful clairvoyant, old John Bunyan. One can hardly imagine the contrast. It must be felt before it is clearly understood. It will be months before even a little shower will dampen our soil. But with our mountains acting as rock-ribbed reservoirs, waiting until the modern machinery of irrigation shall tap them, we are in no sense sufferers. Our enormous crops of fruit, which will some of it go to waste for want of the labor necessary to transfer it from the trees to the Eastern markets, assure us that we are not dull in learning that water is the best fertilizer possible of this soil.

Politics are in a considerable ferment. The present Governor Gage has not been satisfactory to many of his constituents. The Call has attacked his record, in the name of the people. The Governor has so far ignored the political history of the past as to bring a libel suit. It is an axiom that any attempt of this kind always worsts the plaintiff, for an influential daily has the advantage from start to finish. We would be willing to venture the prediction that the chances of the labor party are the best one in three. California has always been one of a kind, in her political activities.

It may be of interest to know that Miss De Young, daughter of the proprietor of the San Francisco Chronicle, has been presented at the English Court.

Every day of this beautiful weather sends those who have a day of leisure to the mountains or the seaside, which constitute the suburbs of San Francisco, for rest and a change of vibrations. It is wonderful what that little change of Tatwas means for man, amidst the hubble-bubble of the Babel of life.

We struggle and weary ourselves with the self-created conditions about us, resisting perhaps our best interests in the effort to paddle our own canoe as individuals, and here we make our mistake. If the Creative Thought had designed we would have supreme and unassociated interests controlling our single lives; He would have put each of us upon a little asteroid and sent us flying through space. But the dictum of the Wisest was, "It was not good for man to be alone," so far as his growth and development were concerned.

While we are not to strive to be hermits in the physical life, much less are we to strive to cut ourselves off from the communion with the Unseen. What does that mean for us, and them? We are strong during physical life, to advance our interests in the material, and also of those connected with us. Our spirit friends are of the same mind and purpose, seeking to be helpful to those in the earth life, and seeking to carry out certain designs of their own. We are in no ways backward in asking for help spiritually and materially from them, for ourselves. But when we are asked to contribute of our means for the helping on of spiritual work of any kind, how many of us think it worth while to respond? We haggle and hold back, and when we find that something has intercepted the flow between us and our guides, we growl at them, even after we have refused them the slightest help at every turn.

How many of us buy a spiritual book, or subscribe for a spiritual newspaper, when we can borrow from friend or neighbor? How many of us put two bits into the collection basket, when we have a nickel in our pockets? How many of the thousands of Spiritualists are contributing to place our Medium's Home upon a self-sustaining basis? How many ever give a cent for anything but a personal or materializing seance? The general propaganda work of the world is carried on by a few, who have laid their lives and fortunes upon the altar of consecration, for the world. Ask the publishers of our books; of The Progressive Thinker, or any one who is standing-in-the-gap of any beneficent enterprise, if this not true. As far as we are concerned, the mutual work of the Seen and Unseen worlds, is wonderfully one-sided. When shall we as Spiritualists be able to show a financial record that generous, public-spirited people will not be ashamed of?

Ernest S. Green, a well-known writer and speaker on spiritual and collateral subjects, has passed into the unseen. He leaves a widow, but no children. He will be missed by a large circle of friends and acquaintances.

James H. Armstrong, another veteran Spiritualist, has gone hence. A life of seventy years has been filled with useful activities. So one by one the brave soldiers fall at their posts.

OBSERVATIONS

On the Internal Causes of Obsession.

To the Editor:—Having read an article entitled "The Internal Causes of Obsession," by John Rutherford, Roker-by-the-Sea, Sunderland, Eng., I would be pleased to reply to it through your most liberal of all spiritual papers.

We are perfectly in harmony with this advanced thinker in many of his leading statements and quotations. That from Mrs. M. T. Longley, "You make a sphere for yourself. You may live in a sphere of harmony, discord, art and science, or create a distinct sphere, which will touch upon the environments or spheres of other individuals."

One from Swedenborg: "These spheres flow from the thoughts of everyone. Those that go forth from the angels are so full of love they affect the inmost life of all with whom they are present. I have sometimes perceived them and have been so affected myself."

Then the spheres are thought-creations of the mind, and as forming an external atmosphere its quality is readily sensed.

We concede that a sphere of harmony may be obtained, when the mind has arrived at a knowledge of the right relation of all things, and every other individual has arrived at this crowning summit of wisdom, endowed with the proper accumulation of moral, intellectual, and spiritual power. Then there will be no discordant sphere in the business world, in the social, the political, aye, the religious world to impinge, or "Force an irrational or fragmentary thought into the consciousness independently of the will, and that irresistibly, and cause much distress," which the gentleman admits it is possible for an impure sphere to do.

Granting that one-third of humanity has acquired a knowledge of the right relation of things, or a state of harmony, how many are applying that knowledge practically and are self-protective against the impure spheres of the other two-thirds of humanity; nor can we afford to ignore this two-thirds majority in treating of this subject.

Is there any liability of their graduating for earth-bounds after this life?

We kindly ask the gentleman, what law precludes their coming into the atmosphere of mortals and affecting their lives?

Swedenborg and thousands of others have perceived them. Now, if the gentleman is possessed of spiritual sight and hearing, and if not he is not prepared to treat this subject fully, but if he is, will he please come with me into the beautiful Spiritualistic Protestant and Catholic churches, and for one moment gaze on the spirit audiences he will surely see there, hovering over and near those mortal audiences. Many of the beautiful spirit ones, and many of the darkened earth-bounds, seeking sensitives for expression. Now come with me to your penitentiaries and asylums, and you will grow wiser but sadder, as to causes and results. Go with me to your marts of business, your boards of trade, your halls of legislation, your court rooms, your legalized saloons and institutions of lust and degradation, the result of all these may flow directly into the homes and to the individuals and especially the sensitive.

Clairvoyancy has now shown you a scale of beings from angelic to the vilest, and because you can see the earth-bound ones; is your clairvoyancy a case of obsession? If so, then are all who see spiritually, obsessed. Then why not grant the statements of the sufferers on whose spheres these earth-bounds force their distressing thoughts; and many of their victims neither see nor hear them, only suffer pain and dejection and sleeplessness; others only hear their threats of paralysis and insanity and feel the possessing of their power bodily, the loss of the will, memory and self-consciousness even while effort is made by the sufferer to overcome these conditions.

Is it rational to conclude that one will think self-destructive thoughts, and repel them at the same time, until driven to intense suffering, suicide or insanity.

If the mortal mind can suggest and hypnotize another mortal, as the gentleman did his patient, why can not a spirit mind suggest to and hypnotize a mortal mind?

The effect of these spheres are truly hereditary; if either father or mother is impinged upon, both will be affected, while neither may comprehend they are spiritually hypnotized; the weaker being the greater sufferer, and their child, as in the case of the gentleman's first patient, can by the natural law of heredity, unseen hypnotism and lack of parental care, arrive at the condition the gentleman describes. Truly the parental condition is visited upon the children for generations. The slave master lashed the slave when he rebelled at his injustice; so will the unjust spirit injure the mortal in his efforts to control. Sunderland is often darkened by clouds not generated by her own atmosphere.

The gentleman claims "that these facts bring disgrace on noble, elevated Spiritualism." Are the moral, intelligent, spiritual classes of our present civilization disgraced by the fact that there exists many classes beneath their status and opportunities, or do they recognize them and strive for ways and means to elevate them? Stop legalizing dens of vice, which generate spirit spheres as vile as those obsessing Mr. Rutherford's patients. His reference to ideational obsession as a group of crude notions taking hold of the mind as, reincarnation, classing such teachers as insane, we are proud of one such American delegate to London's International Spiritual Congress, who was greeted as not only sane, but a grand spiritual power, whose voice has rang out with "the sweetest thoughts from the angels, so full of love and truth that they affect the inmost life of all," who have heard or read her lectures and writings throughout America or abroad.

The knowledge of obsession antedates the time and experiences of Christ, and is thousands of years old, and we do not stand ready in this progressive America to take a superficial view of this deplorable fact, but ever ready to prepare the mind for every existing truth, that humanity as one may purify itself and cease producing such results in the spirit earth realm.

We hope our good brother, if he has not, will read "A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands," "Art Magic," "Ghost Land," "The Watseka Wonder," and some of the many writings, which will throw light on this subject.

PERTINENT THOUGHTS

On the Miracles and the Resurrection.

Two correspondents of the New York Times have taken issue with the Rev. Dr. Savage on account of the opinions expressed in one of his sermons. He is accused of inconsistency because, while believing that Jesus was seen after the crucifixion, he holds that the body was not raised from the dead. As Dr. Savage's views on spiritism and some of the results of the investigations of the Society for Psychic Research, with which he is connected, are tolerably well known to readers of the daily press, there is surely nothing extraordinary in such an opinion coming from a Unitarian minister.

When the same critic further remarks that "men flout the miracles and the supernatural because they cannot explain them, but they are dumb when asked to explain wireless telegraphy," he manifestly overlooks a very essential point of difference. Science, not being dependent upon records several centuries old, the originals of which have been lost and the transcriptions notoriously tampered with, is always ready to repeat its wonders for the benefit of the doubtful or the curious. When a multitude of earnest truth-seekers call upon theology to do the same they get the curt reply, "No; the age of miracles is past!"

The evidence of the "authentic Christian Gospels" referred to by another correspondent has been taken up in the columns of the Times on more than one occasion, and about seven years ago there was a controversy in the New York Tribune upon the origin, genuineness and credibility of the Gospel narratives which lasted for weeks. A similar prolonged discussion on the present occasion is obviously out of the question, but it may be pertinent to quote from a recent very able article on the subject by Prof. Goldwin Smith, of Toronto:

"If the event really happened and is of such unspeakable importance as has been supposed, it would be reasonable, and more than reasonable, to expect not only that the evidence of it should be better than that of any other historical event, but almost that there should be a standing miracle of some sort to place it forever beyond the possibility of doubt. The fact, however, is that the narratives are anonymous; that their authorship is unknown; that they are of uncertain date, and that they are hopelessly at variance with each other. The attempts to harmonize them, such as that of Dr. Greswell, serve only to make the inconsistencies more glaring. Is it conceivable that the records of an event on which the salvation of mankind depends should be left to be cleared from doubt and confusion by the hermeneutic ingenuity of a divine in the nineteeth century? * * It is inconceivable that the power which ordained such an event and for such a purpose should have left its authenticity to rest upon impressions. There can be no use in fondly clinging to that which cannot be upheld."

A significant side light is, moreover, thrown upon the doctrine of the bodily resurrection from two extraneous sources. First, the dogma of the fall of Adam, of which Pauline theology makes the resurrection a necessary corollary, has been utterly disproved by science, and is now known positively to be a Babylonian legend. (The present United States Ambassador to Germany devotes three chapters to a summary of the evidence in his monumental work, "The Warfare of Science with Theology in Christendom.") Secondly, there is not in any of the Gospels a single genuine allusion to the ascension. Every one of the passages is an interpolation, for which it is unnecessary to refer to the most ancient codices, as even the marginal notes in the Revised Version will make the fact sufficiently obvious.

Briggs Park Camp.

Briggs Park opened to-day, July 6. About 300 turned out to hear Dr. L. H. Dowling and D. A. Herrick, who were the speakers of the day. It was the intention of Harrison D. Barrett to be with us, but on account of the illness of his wife he could not come at this time, but will be with us on the 22nd. Dr. Dowling, who is now of our city, but formerly of Battle Creek, is a forceful speaker. It was his first appearance publicly in Grand Rapids, but it will not be his last, as his lecture on "Self-Unfoldment" was well received and favorably commented on.

At 2:30 and 7:30 Mr. Herrick delivered excellent discourses. Although he is so well and favorably known here, the majority of his hearers agreed that his effort at 2:30 was a masterpiece.

We expect Mrs. Critchett at any time. Mrs. Carpenter comes to us next Friday.

Mr. and Mrs. Klauser are with us. She has made quite a hit with her astrology and palmistry.

All things indicate an excellent and successful camp.

A TRUE RELIGION.

The Higher Spiritualism and the Inner Life.

Why not call Spiritualism a Religion, if it is such? I was interested by Bro. H. W. B. Myrick's reflections on the question.

Why not, indeed? Religion, the culture of the inner life, embraces a vast number of people who are not avowed Christians in any dogmatic sense, but who, in business, society, literature, politics, journalism, fairly represent the intellectual force of the American mind.

Spiritualism is rapidly taking on a distinct form or type as a religion, an interpretation of nature. Though not all of a piece, for there are already different schools, including a school of necromancy and a school that is devoted to truth.

One having a philosophy of instinct which seeks to legitimatize passion and sanctify appetite; the other a philosophy of faith which lays great stress on the moral and spiritual intuitions, indulging the brightest hopes for man on the grounds of culture, progressive purity and charity.

The higher school, under various names, is gaining in strength and dignity. The older it grows the calmer and more intellectual it becomes, the clearer its view, the nobler its range of aspirations. As scholars, thinkers, and teachers come to accept and profess it, it takes on a nobler character, a deeper conviction, and exerts a wide influence.

The characteristic of this spiritualized philosophy is that it has broken down the priestly walls and barricades between this world and the next. In showing a cordial harmony between both spheres of life it has brought to view the one inner or spiritual universe, revealing the fact that peace between the mortal and the immortal, the truly human (not the bestial) and the divine, the creature and the great Creative Mind, the repentant sinner and the progressive man in spirit, is not something yet to be effected, but something already done, yes, established in the inner constitution of things, provided for from the beginning.

This makes Religion in every vital sense a new thing. It brings the serious mind and heart of man into rapport with the mind of Eternal Goodness, even while he walks the earth in his material husk.

This it does by the enlargement and development of the sympathetic nature, which is the schooling which it needs to develop the finer, the diviner forces of our inner, sense-transcending nature. Men used to fight and hunt and kill merely for play; but the better, the ethically progressive class do not now mix their pleasure with suffering of the lowliest thing that lives.

People are more loving, they are entering more sympathetically into the lower life around them. As M. J. Savage, I think, sings the thought so sweetly:

"I know not what it is, but when I pass
Some running bit of water by the way,
A river brimming silver in the grass
And rippled by a trailing alder-spray,
Hold in my heart, I cannot, from a cry,
It is so joyful at the merry sight;
So gracious is the water running by,
So full the simple grass is of delight."

So gently sweet is this sympathy with the All-Pervading Life around us! How many mothers' hearts will echo the thought of a "Tired Mother:"

A little elbow leans upon your knee,
Your tired knee that has so much to bear,
A child's dear eyes are looking lovingly
From underneath a thatch of tangled hair.

Perhaps you do not heed the velvet touch
Of warm, moist fingers holding yours so tight,
You do not prize this blessing overmuch,
You are almost too tired to pray to-night.

But it is blessedness. A year ago
I did not see it as I do to-day.
We are all so dull and thankless, and too slow
To catch the sunshine, till it slips away.

And now it seems surpassing strange to me,
That while I bore the badge of motherhood,
I did not kiss more oft and tenderly
The little child that brought me only good.

And if some night when you sit down to rest,
You miss this elbow from your tired knee,
This restless, curly head from off your breast,
This lisping tongue that chatters constantly;

If, from your own the dimpled hands had slipped,
And ne'er would nestle in your palm again,
If the white feet into their grave had tripped,
I could not blame you for your heartache then.

I wonder so that mothers ever fret
At little children clinging to their gown;
Or that the footprints when the days are wet
Are ever black enough to make them frown.

If I could find a little muddy boot,
Or cap or jacket on my chamber floor,
If I could kiss a rosy, restless foot,
And hear it patter in my home once more;

If I could mend a broken cart to-day,
To-morrow make a kite to reach the sky,
There is no woman in God's world could say
She was more blissfully content than I.

But, ah! the dainty pillow next my own
Is never rumpled by a shining head;
My singing birdling from its nest has flown—
The little boy I used to kiss—is dead!

The education of the sympathetic nature is all important. No man or woman can be just without the cultivation of the faculty of imagination—learn to put yourself in another's place if you would be just. Learn to do justice to other faiths, that you may appreciate your own.

Human thoughts about divine things are of every character of nobleness and ignobleness. They vary greatly with culture, civilization, education, moods and feelings. When the conscience is roused by some palpable wrong it feels impelled to resent and resist, a sense of responsibility leaps into light from the dark, the consciousness of moral freedom and power is stimulated, the impulse to dare and do is strong, and the Supreme Power becomes a lawgiver—a holy God—the hater of iniquity and the foe of wrong.

In another mood, when one is in the country—the woods in summer or the sea shore, the spiritual beauty of life seems to appeal to him from every object, it steals in upon his heart through every sense; the whole world seems alive, the sky with living, pulsing light, the earth with flowers, fruits and verdure, the ocean with its myriad waves, the woods with insect life of every form and hue, even the rocks with lichens and crawling plants; Nature's pulses seem audibly throbbing; Man can hear the flow of the all-pervading life, and see the trailing garments of the sleepless life as it quickens atom by atom. Then he ceases to think, his life seems filled with an inward emotion, a deep persuasion that God is ever present, the inner life of each and all, living and breathing in all, giving to the lily its pallor, giving the rose its fragrance, reflecting his light in every jewel dew-drop, refreshing the thirsty earth with the shower; not indeed, an anthropomorphic person, but an inward, flowing life, breathing blessedness from within upon all outward things, himself the inner light and life, love and blessedness of all. The very Celestial world would seem opening to his spirit, in its penetration.

Each mood may be genuine, every impression clear; every inference true and just in its place. This higher Spiritualism of the inner life, is a phase of thought, or rather I might say, of feeling and intuitive perception which by its nature is hard to define precisely in words. It tends to cease as an object and to become an experience of the conscious soul. We meet with it in the attempt of the human mind to grasp the Divine essence or ultimate reality of the life of all things.

It thus measurably enjoys the blessedness of actual communion with the highest. This through thought is the philosophic side of Spiritualism; the religious side is that of emotion, the consciousness of the sympathetic feeling. The fact of its consciousness is its rational justification to the one whose inner life is so quickened. The ever present thought is that of a supreme, all-pervading, and in-dwelling Power, in whom all things are unified. The One of Pythagoras. Its speculative utterances are always more or less spiritually pantheistic in character. On its practical side, the spiritual philosophy, like mysticism, maintains the possibility of direct intercourse with the Great Mind and Being of beings. And this as rationally as the astronomer interprets the sun-centre of the solar system. As Dr. Harnack has said, "It is rationalism applied to a sphere above reason." That is a sphere beyond the logic-chopping intellect.

True reason in man being a light flowing from the fountain and Father of lights, was given to enable man to work out of himself all those notions of God which are the true groundwork of love and obedience to the soul of Goodness and in conformity to Him. Besides the truth of natural inscription, God has provided the truth given by revelation; love quickens the heart to receive and appropriate the living word.

Liberty of judgment is every one's right, but how few there are that make use of this right. For that use depends upon self-improvement by meditation, consideration, examination, prayer and a good and useful life.

No creature can have the vital union with the spirit of Deity until its life is a spirit of Love. This is the only bond of union.

Love has no ulterior ends, wills nothing but its own increase; everything is oil to its flame. The spirit of love does not want to be rewarded, honored or esteemed; its only desire is to propagate itself, and become the blessing and happiness of everything that wants it.

"The only consecrated temple of Divine worship is within each one. There alone can you worship in spirit and in truth. In spirit, because thy spirit is that alone in thee which can unite and cleave to the Light of God, and receive the working of the Divine Spirit upon thee. In Truth, because this adoration in spirit is that truth and reality of which all outward forms are only the figure or symbol for a time, but this worship is eternal."

God loves us as children, not as pets, loves us as a tender but wise and true mother loves her child; not so fondly that she must give him every toy he asks for, and cannot refuse the sweetmeats for which the baby mouth is watering; but with a deep, earnest and anxious affection full of gentle reproofs and sweet corrections, and saving austerities, an affection which the child is far enough from comprehending, which indeed he takes to be something the very reverse of affection, but which if he grows up to be a man, he will bless as the care that educated and redeemed his soul. The Supreme love is simply pledged to make men and women. When we discover that, and begin to become men and women under its discipline, then we shall be prepared to say, "God is love."

From the summit of this high conviction that the human creature is the consummate yet ever progressive flower of creation, we see that God, through conditions, is ever bringing the created mind into deeper and closer rapport with his eternal spirit, with His Inner Light. From this point one looks down in triumph on the writhing world. Incidental evil is no longer a thing to be apologized for; it is a necessity in creation—an educative condition. There could be no God's world without it. The whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain, waiting for the manifestation of the sons of God, and if they arrive, the groaning is prophecy, and the travail is joy. The higher, yes, the highest spiritual philosophy leads us to this stand and we can echo the lines of Whittier:

"Within the maddening maze of things,
And tossed by storm and flood,
To one fixed stake my spirit clings,
I know that God is good!"

The Water Cure.

An Instructive Backward Glance at the Roman Catholic Inquisition, in Mexico.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF THE HORRIBLE CRUELTIES PRACTICED BY THE INQUISITION AT ONE TIME IN MEXICO AND WHICH FINALLY LED TO THE CONFISCATION OF ALL THE CHURCH PROPERTY OF THE CATHOLICS—MORE CRUEL THAN WAR.

Rev. Francis S. Borton, D. D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church in Puebla, Mexico, sends the Boston Citizen the following "exact translation" from the orignal Spanish, concerning the papal inquisition in Mexico. Being copied from original (papal) sources by Dr. Boston, it is of special value. Our Romanist friends who complain of the "water cure" used on that priest in the Philippines, will be pleased to know that "the lowly church," and not the "heretic," invented this wicked torture:

AN HOUR IN THE MEXICAN INQUISITION, 1595.

There is no sadder page in the blood stained history of Mexico than the one that recounts the sufferings of the Carbajal family at the hands of the Inquisition, in the sixteenth century.

From the records of his trial I take the following description of the torment of Don Luis de Carbajal, by "The Holy Office" in Mexico City, in the year of grace 1595.

He had been cruelly imprisoned, on the charge of observing the Mosaic law in despite of Christ and the holy church."

The scene is the chamber of trial and torment in the gloomy old Inquisition building, that still stands in Mexico City:

"It was then ordered that Don Luis de Carbajal should be brought to the hall of torment, where were assembled the inquisitors and the ordinary, at a quarter of nine in the morning.

"The prisoner having arrived, was warned anew that he should tell the truth, out of reverence and fear of God, and that he should not expose himself to the great trouble and pain that would surely follow his denial.

"He replied that he had already spoken the truth.

"Then the chief inquisitor entered and ordered the prisoner to be stripped naked.

"Having been stripped to the skin, with but a piece of linen about his loins, he was again admonished to speak the truth, that the inquisition might proceed no further.

"He replied that he had already spoken the truth, that he was there to tell the truth, and that his God would help him to support all that he might have to suffer.

"It was then ordered that his arms should be loosely bound with cords. It was done, and the first twist given the cords, whereupon he exclaimed, in a very low voice, 'Have mercy upon me!' and was then silent.

"Being again admonished to tell the truth, the second turn was given to the chords. He screamed aloud, many times exclaiming, 'Alas, alas, alas for me! I have spoken the truth. God have pity on me!'

"He was ordered to tell the truth, and the third twist was given to the cords about his arms, when he screamed, 'O God of my soul, alas for me! they kill me, they kill me,' and this he repeated many times, and at the top of his voice. 'I cannot confess to what I did not do; kill me at once.'

"Being told that he should speak the truth, the fourth turn was given to the cords. He cried aloud with all his strength, 'I die! I die! I cannot confess what I did not do. Kill me, kill me at once!'

"He was warned to tell the truth, and the fifth turn was given to the cords upon his arms. He exclaimed, 'God, who knows the truth that I defend, help me! Oh, kill me now! Alas for me, alas for me! Take my life at once. I have spoken the truth, I have spoken the truth!' All of which he uttered with a most sorrowful and piercing voice.

"Being admonished to tell the truth the sixth twist was given. He cried, 'I have told the truth. See, I have five children. Alas for them, alas for me! How can I confess to what I did not do?' And all this with most grievous lamentations.

"Being warned to speak the truth, the seventh turn was given the cords. He exclaimed, 'Alas, alas, my lords, I cannot confess what I did not do. I have five little children. Oh, brothers, finish me at once!'

"Being advised to tell the truth, the eighth turn was given the cords. He cried many times, 'Finish me at once! O this pain ought not to come upon me to force me to confess what I did not do. Put an end to my life at once!'

"Being warned to speak the truth, the ninth turn was given, and he cried aloud, and said, I would repeat it a hundred thousand times if it were the truth, in order to escape from this torment, but I cannot confess what I never did.'

"Being told to speak the truth, the tenth twist was given to the cords. He cried, 'I would that it had pleased God that I had done that of which I am accused!' When asked what he meant by that, he exclaimed, 'I mean that I had rather be a follower of Moses, and suffer in my soul, and not thus in my body.'

"Then, having suffered the ten turns of the cords about his arms, he was ordered to be seated on the potro, and that the torture irons should be fixed on his arms, thighs, shins, and calves of his legs.

"And when he was seated, tied, and duly stretched, he was earnestly advised that he should tell all the truth, and that otherwise the torment would proceed. He said, 'Most illustrious lords, I would a hundred thousand times that it might please the Holy Virgin that I should not so suffer for the truth.'

"Having been warned to speak the truth, the irons on the right arm were tightened, when he said, weeping, 'Take away my life, for I have told the truth; break my arm in two, finish me at once!'

"Being told to speak the truth, the irons were tightened on his right thigh, when he said in a low voice, many times, 'Finish me now, brother, for I have told the truth.'

"Being admonished to tell the truth, the irons were tightened about his left thigh, when he said, in a low tone, 'Alas, alas, alas! make an end of me! God guard you, my children!'

"Being admonished to tell the truth, the irons were screwed up on his right shin bone, when he said, in a weak voice, 'I have told the truth!' and many times he cried, 'My life is now finished.'

"Being admonished to tell the truth, the irons on his left shin were tightened, and in a faint voice he cried, 'I have told the truth. My children, God keep you! I have told the truth. My life has now become desperate. O God, that I should die here and thus!'

"Being advised that he should tell the truth, the irons on the muscles of his right leg were tightened, and he cried in a louder voice, 'Dear sirs, put an end to my life at once. He who suffers as I do knows what that means.'

"Being warned to tell the truth, it was ordered that all of the irons should be screwed up at the same time, when he cried out often and grievously, 'O God of my soul, I have told the truth!' All of which he repeated in a loud voice, weeping and sobbing, and saying, 'I have told the truth. Alas, alas for me! I have told the truth, may she help me now!'

"Then they beat him upon his mouth, and thrust a stave down his throat, and then poured a jar of water down his gullet through a funnel, about a quart, royal measure, when he moaned, 'Take me away from here. Do not let me die here, do not permit that I should confess to what I did not do!' A second jar of water was poured down him. He said the same. A third jar. The same. A fourth jar. The same. Then they plucked the stave from his mouth, and he said, 'I have spoken the truth.'

"Thus in succession twelve quarts of water were poured down his stubborn throat, and with the twelfth he said, 'I have spoken the truth; why should they kill me for that?'

"The iron collar was then removed from his throat, and he was asked if he desired to say anything. He replied that he had spoken the truth, and, with a low voice, made his moan.

"After a few more of the lesser torments, and finding him still stubborn in his wicked resolution, the lords, inquisitors, and the ordinary, bade the torments cease for that time, and that the prisoner should be thrust again into the sure and safe keeping of the cell of the building of the Holy Office.

"This torment concluded at half-past ten in the morning."

In spite of all his sufferings and protestations this unhappy man was taken from his cell on December 8, 1596, garroted, and then burned in the great Auto de Fe, celebrated on that occasion in Mexico City. He was 36 years of age.

A Methodist Minister's Peculiar Dream.

The following narrative concerning a dream and its fulfillment was given to me by a Methodist minister. I happen to be a shorthand writer, and the minister referred to dictated to me several chapters of autobiography, one of which relates to the dream I asked the privilege of sending it to a Spiritualist paper for publication, but this request was not granted at the time. The other day I received a letter from him conveying permission to print the dream.

He is now an old man, bears an unblemished character, and is well known to thousands of the people in the state where he resides. He is an orthodox Methodist, and, so far as I know, is not at all in sympathy with Spiritualism. Following is the account of the dream, just as it was given to me.

"I had a strange dream. I saw what seemed to me a camp-meeting or something like one—a great multitude of people, with carriages, horses and wagons. One carriage especially arrested my attention. It was very black and closed, so that no person entered it and no person got out of it. It passed slowly through the concourse of people and then was followed by the multitude.

"When I awoke I was in great distress, and when I slept the dream returned the third time. Why I should be so distressed I knew not, for there seemed to be nothing remarkable in the dream that should cause me sorrow, but I was so greatly troubled that I could not attend to business through the day—business of importance, collecting my school bills—until late in the evening, when I concluded to ride out into the country three miles. After passing out of the village, on my way across the prairie, the road which I was traveling ran almost parallel with the way which led to Rushville. Seeing some one riding rapidly up that road I checked my horse and rode slowly, for it occurred to me, 'that person is coming for me.' Why, I knew not. Why I should think so was mysterious, but when he came opposite to me he left the road and came across the prairie to where I was, and asked me if I knew of any person in the village by the name of ——? I said, 'Yes, sir; that is my name.'

"'Well,' said he, 'I have come for you. Your brother, at our house, is very sick, probably will not recover; you had better go right on immediately.'

"It was now late in the evening and the distance was twenty-five miles to where my brother was sick, and at a place where I had never been. Reaching there in the latter part of the night I found it was true, that my brother was very low, but he recognized me, and I found him peaceful and happy.

"My father and mother coming the next day from Monmouth, seventy-five miles distant, where my father was pastor, we all remained with my brother till he was released from suffering and taken home to his Savior. Up to this time, for one week, my dream had not occurred to me, and perhaps never would again, only that after all the preparation was made for the funeral, and we stepped out onto the porch to go with the procession, I saw there, in the back yard, the same scene that I saw in my dream. There was the concourse of people, the carriages, omnibusses, buggies, people on horseback and on foot—a multitude of people—and there were the trees as I saw them in my dream, and there, also, was that same black carriage. It was closed; nobody got in and nobody got out; it moved off slowly, just as I had seen it in my dream. Up to this time I had never seen a hearse. As it moved slowly away the people fell in procession, and even the colored people that I had seen with the multitude were there, and everything just as plain as it was in the dream."

The only comment I have to offer is that the foregoing may be taken as an absolutely true statement of fact.

GIVES HIS SECRET TO THE WORLD.

A Remarkable Discovery By a Remarkable Man.

The Art of Fascinating, the Power of Charming, the Secrets of Personal Magnetism Fully and Completely Revealed at Last.

A Marvelous, Mysterious Force Which Gives Wonderful Mental and Physical Strength, Overcomes All Diseases; Enables You to Know the Secret Natures of Others and to Handle Them as You Please.

Professor R. F. Robertson, Psych. D., C. D., is the greatest living teacher of Personal Magnetism. He has astounded the scientists of the world. He has discovered a new system of developing and imparting magnetic force. He believes the great power he has discovered lies dormant in every individual. He guarantees you can master its strange secrets at your own home and perform wonders of which you never dreamed. You can know at a glance the secret natures, talents, weaknesses, strength and vices of every person you meet. You can quickly develop marvelous physical and mental power, overcome all diseases in yourself or others, banish pain and bad habits without drugs or surgery. Professor Robertson can read your secret nature and influence your thoughts, though a thousand miles away. He can teach you how to do the same. This may seem incredible, but he absolutely guarantees this result under a forfeiture of $1,000.00 in gold. The power of hypnotism, persuasion, threats and entreaties pales into insignificance when compared with the wonders of this mighty force.

Professor Robertson calls his new discovery the "Ki-Magi" System of Personal Influence. You do not have to have subjects upon which to practice. Professor Robertson's instructions are so plain and explicit that you can read them carefully and at once use this great power secretly to influence and control the thoughts and desires of any one you wish. You will be startled and mystified at the wonderful things you can do; you will be astounded at the amazing power that you can exercise over others. Prominent ministers of the gospel, lawyers and business men have mastered Professor Robertson's new system, and they give it their highest indorsement.

S. I. Yetter, of Middletown, Pa., says: "Your 'Ki-Magi' System of Personal Influence has brought me that success in business for which I have been looking. It is the magnet that controls; there is no guesswork about it—it is a scientific fact. It has taught me to know and control myself as well as others."

Mr. Joseph Stelner, 1100 Ninth street, N. W., Washington, D. C., writes: "In your 'Ki-Magi' System of personal Influence I have found what I have for years searched for in vain. It has changed the whole trend of thought and given my life a new meaning. I feel younger and stronger every day. I find in it the key to business success."

Mrs. A. B. Egert, of 502 Woodland avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, writes: "I do not see how any society woman can become a successful leader without a knowledge of the wonderful secrets imparted by the 'Ki-Magi' system."

Mr. George W. Howard, of 157 Beech street, Detroit, Mich., says: "By means of your 'Ki-Magi' system I have made some startling discoveries in the characters of my friends. It is far beyond my fondest expectations. It should be in the hands of every man and woman who wishes to achieve the greatest success in life."

We have just issued 8,000 copies of Professor Robertson's new book entitled "The Secret of Power." We propose to give these 8,000 copies away absolutely free to interested persons for the purpose of showing the startling possibilities of this great discovery. We want you to have one free. After you get one, tell your friend. He will want one also, but he must write at once if he gets in on our free distribution, as these books are going very fast. After 8,000 copies of this book are distributed everybody will want one. But they will cost money then. Remember, they cost you nothing now. IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

THE TWO WORLDS, MANCHESTER, ENGLAND.

IS SPIRITUALISM SACRED OR SENSIBLE?

This was a question addressed quite recently to Rev. Thomas Champness, the renowned Methodist evangelist, and more than one correspondent who has come out of Methodism in favor of Spiritualism has written asking what we think of the reply to the question vouchsafed by the editor of Joyful News, viz., Rev. Thomas Champness.

We give the answer as culled from Joyful News, in order that our readers may also judge of the class of argument which is even yet indulged in by certain antagonists:

"Someone has written to ask what I think of Spiritualism? To which I reply: It is one of the results of unbelief. If Saul had trusted God, he would not have had to find out where the witch of Endor lived. The Bible contains all that God thinks we need to know about the future, and we must not expect Spiritualists to be remarkable for obedience to duty, or to be renowned for the way their prayers are answered.

"You may tell me that wonderful things happen during the dark seances; to that I reply: No wonder that it should be so! Saul had a revelation when he visited the witch, but I don't read that what he heard done him any good! For my own part I will be content to trust God like I used to trust my father and mother. They did not deceive me when I enquired about things I did not understand. They told me to wait, and while I waited, to do as I was told; and so it is with the future. We shall do well to listen to the voice of God as we hear it in the Bible, and then wait til he makes the rest plain.

"'God is light,' and if we do as he tells us we shall be children of light. The Bible tells us to have 'no fellowship with the works of darkness,' so when they blow the candle out I go home! THOMAS CHAMPNESS."

We would first of all direct attention to the gratuitous insult flung at the personality of Spiritualists. The reverend gentleman says "We must not expect Spiritualists to be remarkable for obedience to duty." Truly, there is no direct accusation against the morals of Spiritualists here, but the implication is nearly as plain as that contemptible reference by Dr. Parker to Paul Kruger.

We would remind Thomas Champness that neither Methodism nor even Christianity encompasses the whole of the dutiful portion of humanity. And that the saving grace upon which he so much relies is not always so satisfactory in its operation as he would have us believe.

Why, then, does he insinuate that Spiritualists are not what they should be, when he must know that, judged by the same standard, his own system would inevitably go to the wall.

Thomas Champness may well take a leaf out of the book he prizes so much by copying the example of Gamaliel in the fifth chapter of Acts, who, when he was asked to condemn the new religion of Christ and to slay his disciples, said: "Refrain from these men, and let them alone; for if this counsel or this work be of men it will come to naught: But if it be of God, ye cannot overthrow it; lest haply ye be found even to fight against God."

It is not necessary for us to call attention to the absurd weakness of this attempt by the editor of Joyful News at answering a straightforward question. Evidently he knows nothing of Spiritualism, and the more displays his ignorance by a roundabout answer which misses the point of the questioner entirely.

"When they blow the candle out I go home," he says; and no doubt this would be an act of wisdom. We should do the same ourselves. But we point out to Mr. Champness that this is no answer to the question.

It is certainly of a piece with the usual methods of ignorant clericalism which loses no opportunity of blackening the opposition when no other arguments are forthcoming.

Spiritualism to us is both sacred and sensible.

Sacred because it is a revelation of the higher forces of the universe, and because it brings men to a deeper knowledge of the world of spirit; and further, for the reason that it is the messenger of holy affection continued unbroken through the throes of "death."

Sensible for the reason that it bases the whole of its claims upon observed and recorded facts, and thus is established upon such solid foundations as must uphold any system which shall effectively appeal to the rational sensibility of humankind.

DIET AND DEVELOPMENT.

Question.—On March 24 you delivered a lecture in London on "Vegetarianism in Relation to the Higher Life." I have looked out for some report of this, but without reward. As I am interested in both Spiritualism and Vegetarianism, I should esteem it a favor if you could inform me where a report of the lecture referred to could be obtained. Yours faithfully, H. E. HOLLAND.

Answer, by J. W. Colville.—In reply to the above enquiry, I regret to say that no report of any lecture delivered by me on Vegetarianism has been published, but as I am receiving constant enquiries concerning the relation of diet to spiritual development, I consider a brief reply to the above question may prove of some assistance to my numerous correspondents, to whom I cannot possibly write at any length individually.

At the outset of my discussion of this interesting and important theme, I offer a few words of personal testimony. I have never been for any great length of time a strict vegetarian, but I have often abstained for three or four months at a time when living with food reformers from fish, flesh, and fowl entirely, and it is but honest to say that during those periods I have never experienced the slightest diminution in mental or physical vigor; on the contrary, I may truthfully declare that, other things being equal, I have found a liberal vegetarian dietary regimen highly conducive to the fullest equipment for the varied work in which I am incessantly engaged.

The great question concerning the relation of the food we eat to our higher spiritual development is largely a moot one, chiefly by reason of the very varied motives which induce people to change or greatly modify their outward ways of living. Regeneration, even of the physical, must always proceed in an orderly course from within outward, and it is self-evidently absurd, therefore, to ignore the enormous influence exercised both consciously and unconsciously by mental states on bodily functions.

The devout Jew, who observes in minutest detail every letter of the accepted orthodox dietary law, is largely benefited by his mental and moral attitude toward a matter of religious conviction, while another person abstaining from pork and shell-fish simply because he was afraid such food would make him ill would not receive anything like the same blessing from abstinence.

In like manner the conscientious Theosophist or Humanitarian who feels impelled by a sense of the sacredness of all life is spiritually elevated by living up to the letter of his conviction, while a confirmed dyspeptic, who is constantly afraid of stomach trouble, and who lives chiefly on grains because he is afraid that meat will injure his shattered frame still further, is often no better than a pessimist or misanthrope.

Strong, healthy young people who are members of vegetarian societies, and keep their pledges strictly, often prove by their success in athletic sports that they can enjoy excellent health and maintain exceptional bodily vigor without touching fish, flesh, or fowl at any time. Such persons act from two reasonable motives in combination. They have a conviction that their attitude is highly moral, also that it is strictly sanitary, and moral questions should never be divorced from sanitary considerations.

Very sensitive people who can live fairly sheltered lives, and can enjoy a generous vegetarian table, never require food which would prove objectionable to the strictest supporters of the Herald of Health and similar publications. It can scarcely be successfully denied that the food of which we partake physically is imbued with a psychic essence, therefore when we eat objectively we are also feeding ourselves subjectively. Let everyone be fully persuaded within himself is a wise precept.

Two or three years ago in the columns of the Two Worlds there was much discussion of the food problem, from which the average reader probably gathered that much might fairly be said on both sides of a decidedly interesting question. Our conclusion is that in order to induce and maintain the highest general condition of health on the three great planes of our nature—moral, mental, and physical, we act most wisely when we adopt such diet as we feel is truly best from all standpoints, and most of all we need to eat our food to the accompaniment of noble aspirations and with gladness and thankfulness of heart.

"In the World Celestial."

The following from that brilliant literary weekly, "Boston Ideas," is not only a great tribute to Dr. Bland's book, but also to Spiritualism. We reproduce it chiefly because it shows the trend of the best journalism of the country in treating of Spiritualism.

"In the World Celestial is one of the latest romances written regarding things beyond mere mental ken—and it is one of the most convincing of them all. The story is written by Dr. T. A. Bland, of Chicago, but the experiences he vouches for as actually having occurred in the life of a friend who is a well known and popular author.

"The narrative is far more than a mere story; for it states as truth many things regarding the spiritual world which are commonly considered unknowable—and states them with such quiet definiteness and logical accuracy that one gladly travels with the author and finds the barriers heretofore imposed by death quite broken down and vanished. The author's earnest love for a young girl who died early led him after several years into spiritual communication with her and finally, during a ten days' sleep of his body, he is taken by her among the scenes and dwellers of the spiritual world, which are described with an eloquence which co-operates beautifully with the actual ethical value possessed by the facts narrated.

"The visitor from earth was taken by his guide no further than the third heaven, but he found there certainly enough to delight his hungry heart and soul. They afterward visited the second and first heavens, the latter being of course nearest the earth. The details possess all the elements of reality and they are animated by some of the very highest aspirations and convictions that have been cherished by humanity during all ages.

"The author speaks of them in the most matter-of-course way, and his explanations of phenomena and their processes are as vividly real as they are naturally logical. The book is really remarkable for the fact that it does not try to bridge the two worlds; the consciousness animating it is of itself a bridge which the public will welcome as the most substantial one yet offered the modern world. It is self-evidently true in essentials, and the intelligent simplicity of its statements are its best witnesses. They analyze themselves into manifest proofs.

"The romance of Paul and Pearl (the names here used) is an ideal one which will heal many a sad heart-ache by the genuine soul-substance with which it proves true love to clothe itself, both in the flesh and out of the flesh. It is a beautiful narrative and a notable one; it embodies science, philosophy and religion into a composite unity which becomes only too glad to serve in establishing an universal consciousness of that kingdom whose God is Love, and whose glory is the Light of Life Eternal.

"'In the World Celestial' will win serious adherents to the study of spiritual science because of its dignifying treatment of spiritual phenomena, by its intelligent analysis of the action of cause and effect, and by its ability to render tangible and visible within the thought the conditions of the worlds of finer vibrations which are undoubtedly peopled even though out of range of average human perception and realization. Hearty thanks are due to Dr. Bland for his admirable use of the material committed to his care."

The above book, "In the World Celestial," is for sale at the office of The Progressive Thinker. Price one dollar.

SOME IMPRESSIVE, EARNEST WORDS

Addressed to Those Who Believe in Education.

Of all the works attempted by Spiritualism, I believe that at present the Morris Pratt Institute is the most important. This is the most important stage in the development of the grandest effort ever made to elevate humanity out of ignorance and superstition. If this work succeeds, Whitewater, Wisconsin, is destined to be a kind of Mecca for Modern Spiritualism. If this work fails, alas for Spiritualism; it is doomed to be absorbed by the churches, until there will hardly be enough of its live workers left to say we.

The question now is, what shall it be? Shall we absorb the liberal element in the churches, or shall we be absorbed by the churches? Now is the flood in the tide of Spiritualism, which, taken at its height, will bear it on to certain and speedy victory. We are, or we are not, worthy of this victory. If we do not now come to the front and do our duty, our Spiritualism, instead of being something to which we can point with pride, will be forever gone. We will have proved unworthy, and our "candlestick" will be "moved out of its place."

Thanks to our angel friends, some are being moved upon by a higher power to do their duty. I doubt whether this work will be allowed to lag in any of its departments for the want of persons who will, in this time of need, put their shoulders to the wheel. If those who are now in our ranks will not do their duty, others will be raised up who will. That great man, LaBruyere, truthfully said: "The most delicate, the most sensible of all pleasures consists in promoting the pleasure of others."

There are a few pessimistic people in our ranks, whose "strength is," as Jeremiah says, "to sit still." Such "dogs in the manger," will neither partake nor permit others to do so, if they can prevent it. To such it is useless to appeal; they are Spiritualists without spirituality. Such have no more to do in assisting Spiritualism in its great work than the barnacles which fasten themselves on the bottom of a great ship have to do with sailing the ship. From such nothing more is to be expected than their legitimate work of faultfinding and abuse. To such I make no appeal.

Some power, without my seeking it, has placed me at the head of the Morris Pratt Institute. That same power, whatever it may be, has moved me to pledge all I have and all I am to its success. That Institute will go forward and do its work, or I will go into the spirit world or into an asylum as a result of trying to place it where it belongs.

The power which first stimulated Morris Pratt, still holds him. He has now, in order to help me do the work to which I am called, given me, without any solicitation on my part, a deed to a good home adjoining the college. He has also voluntarily given up the portions of the building which he had reserved for his own use. He is to-day earnestly looking for opportunities to do more.

Also our Board of Directors, composed of as good men and women as can be found anywhere, are working with a will, guided by wisdom, to make this school a success to which future generations of Spiritualists can point with pride.

If every Spiritualist in the land would take hold of this work as our Board of Directors have done, and would give one hundredth as much in proportion to their wealth, as some of them have done, we could, without another penny, put our college in order and educate more than fifty noble young men and women who are now without means and asking us to place them where they can be of service to the world.

Perhaps our secretary has ere this informed the public that our Board of Directors met on the 24th, 25th and 26th ult., and did a great deal of important business. We figured as nearly as possible the expense of putting the building in order; putting in steam heating apparatus, which should keep every room from cellar to garret comfortable in the coldest weather; putting in bathrooms and water closets on each floor; plumbing and other necessary improvements, and running the school thirty six weeks in the year. The expense will be six thousand dollars. One-half of that money is either paid or pledged. That leaves three thousand dollars more which must be raised during the remainder of 1902.

In order to cut the expenses down to that amount every one of the four teachers now engaged agrees to teach the first year for a sum so small that I would not dare to put it down here. I will only say my salary is exactly the same as that of each of the other teachers, and it is less than one-third of what I have received per year during the last four years, as pastor; and only one-fourth of what I could have taken at two different places this year. I do not say this for any other purpose than to show the world how devotedly and self-sacrificingly our teachers are at work. After spending a great deal of money and preparation for this work they work for less than a hod carrier's wages.

The members of the Board, who were present at the last meeting, after having before subscribed and paid more than they were able to do, have doubled their subscriptions.

It is said of Daniel Drew, that he "once upon a time" made a large subscription to build a church. When he paid that subscription he said, "When I made that subscription I did not know where the money was to come from to meet it, but I trusted in the Lord, and I went out on Wall Street, and by the grace of God, I skinned it out of those fellows in less than one week." So one of our sisters, who subscribed one hundred dollars, to make up the six thousand, said, "My assets all told are not worth the amount of this subscription, and my wages will hardly support my family; but, by the Eternal, I'll go from house to house and beg it." And to begging she has gone, and she is succeeding.

I now ask each one who reads this paper, to decide, at the earliest moment what he can do, and sit down immediately and write to our secretary, Clara L. Stewart, at Whitewater, Wis., or to me at Lily Dale, N. Y., or, after Aug. 1, at Whitewater, Wis., and enclose either a draft, postoffice order, or a pledge to help the school.

The amount of money here mentioned does not cover the money which must be paid out for furniture for four suites of rooms, two in each suite, twelve other single rooms and two kitchens and dining-rooms, beside dishes to set the tables for forty to fifty students. I believe there are persons in our ranks who will volunteer to do that work. Brother John C. Bump perhaps would not like to have me mention the fact, but beside what he has already done he volunteers to furnish one room. I promise, beside all the other work that I do I will keep one student in the school at my expense, and will furnish one room with an iron bedstead, a good quality of matting and other as good furniture as if I was furnishing it for myself.

The building is being thoroughly overhauled, and put in first-class order, and we want no old cast-off furniture. We want it so furnished that we will not be ashamed nor afraid to show any room in the building to strangers and tell them who furnished it. Every one who furnishes a room has a right to name that room for any person, or give it any other appropriate name he may choose. The room I furnish will bear the name Valhalla. Hoping to soon receive agreeable responses to this paper, I am, as ever, in the cause of a better and more integral education,

HOLY WARS.

Socialism and the Catholic Church in Conflict.

Three articles in The Progressive Thinker of July 5 issue, one by "Free Thinker," headed "Holy Wars Are Completely Played Out;" the second by C. H. Mathews, headed "Religion In Germany," and the third, an editorial headed "Rome Shows Her Hand," have especially attracted my attention and prompt me to throw a little side-light on the subjects treated by the abovementioned articles, for the benefit of the readers of The Progressive Thinker.

It is well known to all who are familiar with the tenets of the Roman Catholic religion, that one of the fundamental principles of that faith is union of Church and State, whenever and wherever it is possible for them to establish it. Through so-called divine authority and apostolic succession, the pope and priesthood claim the right to rule the people, both temporally and spiritually, and this claim is never abrogated by them except by force of conditions beyond their control. This accounts for the unwillingness of the authorities at Rome to accede to the requests of our government concerning the Friars' lands in the Philippines.

Whenever they obtain a foothold they never retreat until compelled.

Whoever understands the doctrines of Socialism knows that the Socialists are striving to establish a co-operative system of industry, and government under the direct control of the people on the "referendum" or "direct legislation" principle. This democratic rule of the people, by the people, is fundamentally opposed to the Roman Catholic doctrine of divine authority, hence, the organized forces of the Roman church are actively opposing Socialism. The countries composing central and southern continental Europe have been the stronghold of the Roman Catholic church and by referring to statistics we find that the percentage of the population of those countries, who belong to that faith, is very large, in some of them being almost total.

The percentage of Catholics in the population is as follows: Austria-Hungary, 87.22 per cent; Belgium, 98.57 per cent; Italy, 99.85 per cent; Spain, 99.86 per cent. Socialism is getting a strong foothold in all of these countries, and as a consequence is making very many converts among the Catholics, and is splitting the Roman church in twain. It is a part of the old fight between so-called revelation and rationalism, blind faith and reason, ecclesiastical despotism and democracy. Germany bears the distinction of being the native land of Marx, Engles, Lassalle, Liebknecht, Bebel, and other founders and leaders of modern Socialism, and the Socialists are so strong there that they are giving Emperor William a great deal of anxiety, and are driving him to all sorts of alliances to get his pet military and naval measures through the reichstag. Bismark banished the Jesuits from Germany but William has restored their former privileges, and as is shown by his speech, to a Catholic audience, at Aix La Chapelle (quoted by Mr. Mathews), he is in humor to swap favors with the Vatican. His illiberal drift of mind was exemplified a few months ago when he expressed a desire to drive Christian Science and Spiritualism out of Germany.

Many years ago Andrew Jackson Davis predicted that a great and bloody conflict would eventually ensue between Roman Catholicity and the "Harmonial Philosophy." Through the co-operative system and material equality Socialism aims to, practically, establish universal brotherhood, or, virtually, the Harmonial Philosophy. With present conditions and their trend, who can confidently say that "Holy Wars Are Completely Played Out?"

"The Only Spiritualist Church."

To the Editor:—I have just read your clipping from the Philadelphia American. How very modest is the writer in saying, "The only Spiritualist church in the world will have Mrs. Palmer for pastor. It will be the Church of the Soul, and meet a long-felt want of hundreds of earnest Spiritualists who seek a church where God may be worshiped."

I once met a lady who said Spiritualism, Christian Science, Mental Science and magnetic healing were of the devil, but divine healing was of God. She was a divine healer.

I supposed that Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond's church in Chicago, the Church of the Soul, was a Spiritualist church; but Mrs. P. will copy the form of worship after the Unitarians and use their hymnal.

This reminds me what a Spiritualist sister said to me the other day. She had been spending some months in the East, and remarked, "They are stealing our name away from us. Some one was telling of communications, etc., and I said 'that is Spiritualism.'"

"'Oh, no!' she rejoined, 'that is the higher life, the new thought.'"

I am glad that the light of truth is shining in our day, and hope many lives will be blessed thereby. But though this new light comes through various names, as the occult sciences, etc., yet we, fifty-year-old Spiritualists, can remember the beginning. We have borne the heat and burden of the day, we know what it cost to advocate the unpopular truth in those early days.

But to return to Mrs. P. She should know that the worship of God in all the centuries of the past has deluged the world in blood. Those who feel they are God's special favorites coerce the more degraded, as they think, when they may have more correct views of the deific power than the self-righteous persecutors.

"It is not every one who has the gift of clairvoyance. I possess it." It may be a lamentable fact that there are many who claim to possess mental powers who do so to make money, but I have met very few. It may be that my life path has been through green pastures and beside still water, but today I can only name one whom I think was a veritable fraud, coining money out of credulity and the sweet memory of the dear departed.

I wish Mrs. P. would give us her thought of the God the Spiritualists desire to worship. When the door was first opened between this and the spirit world, we asked, Have you seen God? and the reply came, "No more than when on earth," and the highest we have met say the same. The spirit in the blade of grass and in the highest unfolded human spirit, may be the same only in degree of unfoldment. God is in his universe, but not in any individualized form.

I shall be glad when all the Sunday Spiritual meetings shall teach advanced truths—shall stimulate the spiritual powers to greater unfoldment, that shall touch the lives, and bear fruit, to make people honest, just, tolerant, helpful and above all charitable and loving. There is great cause for thankfulness, for hopefulness, for encouragement. Let us look for the good, let us encourage the faint-hearted, let us assist and not discourage the humble mediums that the spirit world have chosen to reflect the light of higher truths than now bless the world.

Spirit Photography.

William Denton, when on earth, was one of our most profound scholars and thinkers. But he did not then claim to know it all, nor does he now.

In Wm. W. Aber's great book, "Rending the Vail," page 332 Denton says:

"Photography, especially spirit photography, is a deep subject and it would be very difficult to explain to the understanding of any person in the mortal. But in this, let me say, you are the negative while you are surrounded by electrical currents for the positive.

"You look away toward the heavens of an unclouded sky, at evening, and behold myriads of beautiful shining gems gloriously sparkling in the all encompassing dome of the dark night, while to us those same shining points are immense globes—vast suns to immense systems bearing life, life, sentient life. All moving in their destined rounds, rolling upon our souls the sweetest symphonies of eternal grandeur.

"As you increase your power of vision by artificial means, you have opened to your view new fields of solar systems in the far-away regions of vast immensity; but by no artificial means do you, because of their great distance from you,) behold them but as specks of glittering dust upon the floor of the heavens.

"But, when freed from the mortal and your dim earthly vision becomes exchanged for that of archangels, your unobstructed spiritual vision will penetrate so far into space that no point but what some radiant mighty globe will be in vision range.

"Thus the bound of vision is one brilliant concave of shining globes for our eternal study.

"And on the other hand, while your vision may be assisted by artificial means to survey very minute particles of matter and forms of life, yet the freed spirit can see down to the very atom and behold the dawn of life itself.

"Magnetic and electric currents are as perceptible to our vision as little rills or large streams of water to your vision.

"We can see your bodies filled with millions of little electro-magnetic pores, or tubes, never recognized by mortal, from which continually emanate magnetism, electricity, and electro-magnetism, as resultants from continual chemical action in your systems.

"Your bodies, even yourselves, are composed of chemicals. Now, your scientists, by studying and experimenting with chemicals and electricity, are enabled to produce to a limited extent, certain voluntary results proportionate to the knowledge and experience of the operator as to the laws governing; but can produce no results only according to the natural law of the case; but, by the law, according to his knowledge and skill, may produce voluntary modifications.

"So in this life we have scientists, who, by their knowledge and skill as to the laws of spirit chemistry, are enabled to produce and project back to mortal perception certain modifications showing continued life and personality of the real being called a spirit.

"Spiritual chemicals from the mortal plane must necessarily be used by the spirit scientist to make the spirit form perceptible to the senses of the spirit while in the mortal.

"Those mortals giving off or radiating certain suitable spiritual chemicals are necessary from whom for spirits to obtain such emanations; such persons are called mediums.

"Spirit photography is the most delicate of all phases of mediumship. The condition of the atmosphere, of the mind, and health, and chemical equilibrium of the medium, of the chemicals, the plate, and the want of skill on your side—any one or all of these may greatly modify an effort, though ever so good on our part. But you are succeeding here. Great changes are taking place.

"Altogether man is a queerly constructed being. You cannot tell your own structure. The motions, the currents, the affinities of particle for particle of matter in and about your structure give it the appearance to spirit eye of millions and millions of little wheels, of little chains and cogs. Over here we see more facts than with our obstructed earthly light; but no one has ever yet been able to fully illustrate man."

SATURDAY, JULY 19, 1902.

Decrease of Romanism.

According to the Washington Bureau of the Chicago Tribune, the Very Rev. J. R. Slattery, of St. Joseph's Seminary at Baltimore, has caused quite a sensation in Roman Catholic circles by the statement he made at the ordination of a colored man to the priesthood. Bishop Slattery asserted that the Roman Catholic Church was losing ground in the United States at an astounding rate and gave the following figures:

Roman Catholics in the United States, 1902, 10,976, 757.

Roman Catholics in the United States, 1890, 8,301,367.

Apparent increase of Roman Catholics in twelve years, 2,675,390.

Roman Catholic immigrants during same period, 2,705,184.

Loss on the face of the figures without taking into account the natural increment from births and conversions, 29,784.

The figures are taken from the Catholic Directory, an official publication of the church, and the reports of the Bureau of Immigration. The figures for the immigration include the immigrants from Austria, Belgium, France, Italy, Poland (exclusive of Russian Poland), Portugal, Spain, and Ireland, together with a conservative estimate for German Roman Catholics. The vast French-Canadian immigration, and the Roman Catholics from other countries, as, for instance, England and Scotland, are also excluded. Therefore conservative Roman Catholics admit that any obvious errors are more than counterbalanced by the factors omitted from consideration.

Ecclesiastics here have talked over the situation, but beyond expressing astonishment at the situation, none would attempt to discuss the condition.

An influential number of priests and laymen met and suggested that a memorial be drafted requesting the board of archbishops, which meets at the Catholic anniversary next October, to take measures to secure a more accurate parochial census. It is not expected that this census will materially alter the figures, as the census given in the Catholic Directory is the total of the official returns of the various pastors through their bishops and archbishops. No reason can be assigned why the pastors should minimize the importance of their parishes.

It was also suggested at this meeting that neglect of work in the rural districts would account for much of the apparent loss. It was cited that 4,000,000 of the 10,000,000 Catholics of the United States reside in the six great centers of population—New York, Chicago, Philadelphia, Brooklyn, Boston and New Orleans. Th fact that nearly half of the Roman Catholic contingent resided in localities which did not contain a tenth of the whole population of the United States is significant, and some say that the whole program of the national hierarchy will have to be revised before the drain upon the Catholic church ceases.

It is too early to predict what methods will be adopted to remedy the conditions. It is, however, freely stated that the next meeting of the board of archbishops in this city will be called upon to discuss measures of greater importance than any body of Roman Catholics since the adjournment of the third plenary council of Baltimore. It is also suggested in some quarters that the revelation of Dr. Slattery will doubtless hasten the calling of the fourth plenary council. It will require at least three years to codify the data to be considered by such an assemblage; but it is not now considered unlikely the board of archbishops at their next meeting will set the machinery in motion to bring about this event. Meantime, it is the unanimous opinion of the clergy here that strenuous measures must be immediately adopted to prevent the terrible loss of communicants.

A well known priest here said: "The woeful phase of this revelation is the terrible increase of atheism. It is a fact that only a small portion of the Catholics fall away from the church by apostasy to the sects. They drop from the church into the ranks of atheists, and their children grow up absolutely godless."

It is customary for Romanists to make great claims for the growth of their church in the United States, hence it is all the more worthy of notice that assertions to the contrary are now freely made.

By counting men, women, children, babies and all, they have made their numerical strength appear far greater than truth would allow, in comparison with other religious denominations.

The atmosphere of freedom of thought that prevails under our Constitution and institutions, such as our common school system, is in deadly antagonism toward Romanism and all that Romanism stands for and implies. Under the influence of general intelligence and thought free from priestly dictation, it is no wonder that thousands cease to be Rome's slaves, and hence are dubbed atheists, etc.

A Little Boy Plays with His Spirit Sister in the Woods.

Purely by accident, says the St. Louis Globe-Democrat, the psychic societies have recently captured a ghost. An uncapped lens of a camera, left in the deserted library of an old English manor house, reveals, we are told, on the developed negative the veritable figure of the lord of the manor seated in a high-backed chair of the ancient sanctum. And this at the very hour when the body of said lord was being laid away in a kirkyard near by.

Of course, the Society for Psychic Research is taking care of the mystery, and Sir William Crookes, who has already made some progress in spirit photography, will probably know what to do with it.

Meantime the poets and seers who stand harking with spirit ear at the door of the arcanum advise us not to be cast down by such mystery, or marvel, but to "go right on." Of late, joining hands with science, they whisper stoutly, "Let us recognize that mystery of this kind exists, but until it reveal itself we have not the right to relax our efforts to cast down our eyes and resign ourselves to silence." The aim of all men should be to master the forces of matter and wrest from them their secret, and then go on to that general secret of all life which "lies hidden at the end." The fact that science has become hospitable to a ghost and set upon taking its photograph is directly in the line of their counsel, even though the unbelieving are out with cameras and confederates trying to show by what neat tricks and accidents the filmy ghosts may be developed.

There was a time when the wondrous feats of the Indian fakirs were submitted slyly to the tests of the camera, and the trees and flowers and dancing angels which they claimed to bring straight from paradise or some depths of the unnown would make no impression on its plates. Hence they were not there, said the savants, and meant simply an optical illusion produced by the magicians, and on the strength of this dictum the value of the camera in catching creatures or things that were there has been on the increase. No freaks of the imagination or nerve disorders could deceive this calm "eye of science," it was said, and the veritable figure of a dead or absent lord on the sensitive plate of an open camera in his deserted library must mean something of that lord's ability to transport himself about, independent of his body. Barring the chance of some sly page or butler slipping in to assist a materialized spirit to the lord's oak chair, one would say that it must. And just for this reason it may be well to take the advice of the higher lights and go straight on spiritualizing ourselves with a view to getting thus at the truth of the matter, however science may hobble along either with or without us. It must be easier for spirit to discern spirit than for the lens of a camera to catch up with one, and if a respectable dead man will go and sit down with a photographic apparatus there may be no reason why he would not associate with any of the least of us if we would give him proper encouragement.

The dullness with which the second century man looked into the infinite deep of heaven with all the starry realms of being and deemed it but a pretty tint cover for his flat earth, was slight beside the stupid blindness in which we walk among the invisible forces of creation, and powers that sway us on every hand in the practical belief that we are the only quickened spirits in the illimitable space. That every drop of water or atom of matter is aglow with invisible life science declares to us, but that the highest form of life, the spirit life, is everywhere we are loth to believe, because science has not adjusted its lens to capture it. As well might we declare that there is no melody in the forest nor music in the spheres, because the human ear can follow but to a certain point those vibrations of sound, which yet go on and on in the divinest harmony through all creation's bounds. To listen with "soul, not ear," and catch the "quiring to the young-eyed cherubims," as the poet catches it through spirit sympathetics, is the thing the seers and singers of all ages have taught us, and yet we wait for some advance of material science to convince us that there are spirits touching us at every corner.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," said the Lord of Spirits, and that appears to be all there is of it; and no time, nor condition is set to the achievement of that purity and sight. Moses, Socrates, Buddha, may all have compassed it, as the tales record, and any living creature who could bring himself to that pure, transparent atmosphere of that unstained spirit, could no doubt walk with God and the angels, whether in the body or out of the body. It is in such hours of spirit exaltation that the good and gifted ones of all ages have believed that they broke through the bars of sense and held communion with celestial beings, or with the souls of their beloved dead. And whether their belief is assured or not, at least there is enough in it to point the conclusion that it is along this spirit line that our best hope comes.

Speak to him, for he hears you,
And spirit with spirit may meet, says Tennyson, and there is little doubt that with that faith and understanding the communion of spirits, whether visible or invisible, would not be difficult to establish. Everything in the universe has its own medium of life and communication, and innocence and trust may be more enticing to spirits than all the scientific courtesies of the schools. Poets like Shelley and Wordsworth have believed that sweet and guileless infancy holds long a close and glad relation to the angels, ere the "shades of the prison house begin to close about the growing boy," and it may be that here, as elsewhere, it is the little child who can best show us the way into the kingdom.

A pretty story of one of these little ones comes from a fair suburban home not far away. Two children, John and Mary, were born to that home, and, as the old poet has it, "grew in beauty side by side," while all nature bowergowned and blossomed about them and filled their souls with its joy. Cultured Christian parents nurtured them and a little leaf-embowered church and Sunday-School gathered them in for wondrous stories of heaven and the angels. But one sad day a shadow fell across the threshold and in the wake of it Mary slipped away to another country. The parents mourned her as dead, but Johnny, who had been told that she was an angel, went out under the spreading elm where they had been wont to play together to find out about it. And there, shortly, his mother found him, in great joy, playing, as he insisted, with the little sister, who had come when he called her and promised to be his playmate still. For days and weeks he played about the old haunts, or rambled through the woods in the avowed companionship of the departed sister, and the astonished parents, who watched him curiously, found him talking, laughing and sporting gleefully as with some visible playmate. He did not die, nor go into a fever, nor develop any of the brain diseases nor eccentricities that science might have expected of him. But one day he came in sadly and told his mother that Mary had gone away and could not come to play with him any more.

Of course the psychical societies make short work of such cases, and there may be plenty of them among the imaginative children of the land. But, after all, in their trusting simplicity, they come perhaps as near to the spirit truths in the matter as "the obstinate questionings" and "blank misgivings" of older creatures, "moving about in worlds not realized."—Irene Clark Safford.

Why Is the Catholic Church a Dangerous Power?

We see in the Catholic church what used to be. It has not purposely deviated one hair's-breadth from its primal object. It mourns bitterly because its "temporal power" has been snatched from its grasp. It is seeking to restore it by a subtle scheme that is covertly, if not openly, supported by every leader from the pope down to the deacon and nun. Is its ambition worldly aggrandizement? No more so than with other sectarians. When we compare the devotedness of the Catholic, the spirit of sacrifice, the everyday charity for the unfortunate, the most zealous Protestant falls below par. The Catholic is really religious; the Protestant protests about religion in spite of his creed, and therefore is behind in the art of sectarian conquest.

There must be some secret spring or charm in Catholicity that holds the masses so to its authority. What if we do hedge it round politically and handicap it from seizing the government, have we changed its religious make-up? Let us peer beneath its vast machinery, so perfectly dovetailed together, and analyze as best we can its inner life. No well-informed Catholic priest or layman will consent to the Protestant charge, that even the pope has power in himself to forgive sins. He and all his official subalterns claim to be simply intercessors or media. Nor will they consent to the charge that there is any saving virtue in the ceremonials and symbols. These, too, are but instrumentalities to fix religious attention and point the way. The observance of the rites and sacraments are rigidly enforced to subordinate the devotees to the church authority; and it can not be questioned but that such externalities are mere idolatries with unlearned and superstitious Catholics. All Catholic history, saintship and fealty center in the concession that the church is God-ordained, and, therefore, has the supreme right to dictate terms in the conduct of life, including education and government. When a person concedes this premise, he or she, though labeled Protestant, is Catholic in sentiment, and given the opportunity will naturally drift into that church.

Why is it that certain unwary yet thoughtful Spiritualists, mediums as well, have thus been caught and swallowed up in the ecclesiastic maw? With very few exceptions, Spiritualists maintain that spirit is causation, and form or material structure is simply effect. The Catholic church plants itself right there. Is it any wonder that some Spiritualists, weary of the unrest incident to the battle for independency, fall into the arms of the "Mother Church?" Nearer right than the Protestant, that church seized upon the fundamental principle of Spiritualism and built itself up into a giant monopoly; as though a principle were more authority when churched! as though a principle can better evolve itself into highest use when enslaved to a hierarchy! Incident to the assumption of the church, the pope in his official capacity is reverenced as immaculate. This to give him greater power. No government over men is so tyrannical as when it fetters his moral judgment. All religious history proves this. The devotees of this church are taught from childhood that it is instituted by the Almighty, and is the only authoritative channel through which religious and political rights and duties are revealed. The saints of the ages schooled in it, and risen out of it, through pater nosters and self-penances, intercede with the Virgin Mary, who has maternal access to Jesus, to pardon sin. To them that believe in this machinery, and doubt no papal edicts, how sacred appears the church! How ready are they to lay down their very lives to defend it against its enemies! What a power, what a danger it is wherever constructed into priestly office! What can be so menacing to American freedom as a religious dynasty, fashioned to the medieval thought which shapes its ends, whose devotees deem it righteousness to obey its orders, even in the persecution and murder of heretics! Does it do this now? It dares not; but give it the power it seeks, and then see how quick the Inquisition is restored. The Inquisition is the natural outgrowth of a church, the conscience of whose devotees is warped to believe it is immaculate. In Italy, where it is centralized, where centuries of rule have goaded free thinkers to dare its authority, it is losing ground; in our country, where license permits, it is gaining with wonderful strides. Its symbolic glitter, its imposing rites, its scholarly priesthood, its interference with all the issues of the hour, its kingly power to determine how the votes shall be cast, capture the masses, and our politicians, President included, toady to the Vatican for favor to "our party!"

Are we not approaching the dangerline, which, if we pass, erects the papal crown over the ruins of our Republic? Even the Protestant churches, with some creditable exceptions, are in the same trend. They do not declare directly for a union of Church and State; but they do declare that "the State must run parallel with the church, and both mutually help each other." They openly concede the validity of the Catholic postulate, that "the church at large is a spiritual commonwealth, and therefore has authority higher than the State." Is not this the very initial step the Catholic church is seeking toward a constitutional union of Church and State?

Patriotic necessity, if no higher consideration, should bring all lovers of liberty and truth into unity of force to resist these ecclesiastical tyrannies, and by enlightenment lift humanity out of its "slough of despond."

Haunted by a Scream.

Such items as the following from the daily press have no little effect upon the minds of this thinking mass of humanity of the present day. In fact coming as it does from a secular source, will do more to inform the general public that the friends are not dead, but living and conscious as ever, and with power of expression and means of recognition, than all the long-drawn-out scientific explanations put together, because it reaches them and touches them, free from their bitter prejudices, it comes home to them as a recorded fact, not as "the outcroppings of a distorted brain," as they would term it in a Spiritualist paper. All these long dissertations upon the philosophy of spirit return are read with interest and are educative in the ranks of Spiritualism, and occasionally catch a scientist on the outside, but these little unostentatious daily occurrences win a class that cannot be reached in any other manner, people who think but have no time to investigate. Here is the item from the Chicago American:

"Haunted by the ringing of a woman's screams in her ears, Mrs. John Jones, 126 East Ninety-fifth street, has appealed to the South Chicago police to search the sewers for the body of Mrs. Evan Williams, her dearest friend, who, she thinks, met death in the revolting stream that flows through the dark tunnel under the street in front of her house.

"Mrs. Williams and Mrs. Jones were girlhood friends and lived together in Ninety-fifth street.

"On Monday last Mrs. Williams left home to visit her sister, also a Mrs. Jones, living at Ninety-seventh street and Escanaba avenue. She has not been seen since. She never arrived at her sister's house.

"The sewers will be searched for evidence of a crime unless the absent woman returns. Mrs. Jones is on the verge of prostration, for the sepulchral voice still rings in her ears."

Mrs. Jones evidently hears a spirit voice, presumably (until proven) that of her friend, Mrs. Williams, and by following its guidance the mystery of her disappearance will be solved.

The Portrait of a Man Dead Appeared on the Negative.

Quite a strange phenomenon has presented itself on a photograph which was recently taken in the vicinity of Washington, Ga. A few weeks ago Mr. Thomas Cade, a young amateur photographer, was engaged in taking landscape views in Elbert county, he photographed the old home of Capt. Joshua DuBose. When the negative was developed a strange and weird spectacle was presented. Up on the left hand corner of the picture appeared the face and body of a man, apparently very aged. Upon close inspection it was noticed that the likeness was very much like that of Capt. DuBose, who had been dead several years. The picture of the man was not as plain as the rest of the photograph, but to the naked eye it could be plainly observed.

Those who knew Capt. DuBose, when they observed the picture were startled at the remarkable resemblance between the mysterious cloud picture and the dead man. The photograph is still in the possession of Mr. Cade, and is being exhibited over the country.

A SWEARING EXPERIMENT.

"Cuss Words" Effect Remarkable Cures.

An up-to-date healer in the far Southwest has built up an extensive practice for the sole purpose of ascertaining the truth, by fearless, and, it might be said, audacious experimentation along the line of drugless methods of healing.

For some years this healer has advocated new and strangely original propositions in regard to the power by which healing as a result is obtained by the various schools whose students are now practicing in this country.

This experiment may savor a great deal of what a few years ago would have been called sacrilegious, but in these progressive times it will be heralded by the thinking healers and laymen as a real up-to-date experimental propaganda for truth's sake, and we here reproduce the healer's own statement in his own words:

Last Sunday, July 6, one of our county officials presented himself in our office with a rheumatic shoulder that he wished to have restored to normal conditions, obviously for the reason that rheumatic pains are not very pleasant to endure, together with the fact that the arm and shoulder had become almost useless as a member from which a great deal of functional activity is required.

After an hour's spirited conversation relative to the interesting subject—healing—we concluded the right moment had arrived for us to perform our duty as a healer, and as our patient did not represent the long-faced sanctimonious type of a certain class of believers, and at the same time being a personal friend, we took the liberty to ask what kind of method he would prefer us to make use of to be incorporated in the healing process; to which he answered that he did not know nor did he care, just so he got rid of that jackscrew-working rheumatism as quick as possible. We saw here a great opportunity to prove by actual demonstration, the position we have long held to be true, and were not slow in taking advantage of the situation; and submit this demonstration as corroborative evidence in proving our postulate.

At this stage of the proceedings we jokingly asked him: "Shall we use the praying method, or the swearing method? We leave it to your choice to select the method you may consider the most efficient."

His answer was, that he believed the one just as effective as the other, and that we were at liberty to use any method we might feel inclined to believe would give the quickest and best result. Knowing that either method would give exactly the same result, we quickly answered him, saying:

"For your sake and for the sake of truth we shall now proceed with the healing act under the swearing method, that you may in this experiment have proof that what we have told you concerning this subject is true"—and as we placed our hand at the base of his brain we commenced cussing him and his rheumatism in this manner (readers will please not get nervous now).

"You—here I used the swear words—we are now going to cure that damnable rheumatism so quick that it will make your head swim the moment Satan assisted by all his imps gives the last turn on those rheumatic jackscrews in your shoulders which you have imagined as a fair sample of Hell on Earth," etc. Thus cussing him and his rheumatism for about four minutes, we pronounced him permanently cured and commanded him to try his arm and shoulder any way he pleased, he would find them perfectly restored to normal condition, with full muscular activity in every respect.

The trial he put that arm and shoulder to in windmill-like gyrations was a caution to behold.

However, we admit our awkwardness when it comes to using cuss words, for we are no adept in that kind of language, but the result was nevertheless so presto changelike—"now you see it, but now you don't"—that our brother healers will not fail to arrive at the conclusion that if our brother healer across the way heals the sick by prayer and faith in a supposed omnipotent power, then we did the same by swearing, although we had no faith in its efficacy, for neither one or the other has anything to do with the results obtained.

But the lesson we wish to impress upon our brother healers is this: Do not be afraid of experimenting; do not be afraid of truth, for neither one of them will hurt you.

It is obvious from the above that a great fallacy is being preached and heralded over this country from one end to the other, under this or that ism, and it is hoped that this the most potent and effective system of (drugless) healing will at no distant day be placed upon its true basis, where it will, as it should, be accepted as such by this progressive generation, who might then in full measure receive the benefit nature has in store for her benighted children, that they might live a happy life conducive of a higher development of the human soul on this the physical plane of existence.

AN INVESTIGATOR.

Advantages of Superstition.

Professor Starr is reported to have amazed the students at the University of Chicago by declaring that superstition is spreading among the intellectual classes.

If the report be true the students are easily amazed. Even otherwise there are no intellectual classes. Here and there are a few thinkers. The rest of the community is made up of workmen, operators, professional folk, society people of every kind and imbeciles of every variety.

Assuming that superstition is spreading among any or each of these classes, what harm shall it do? A superstition is a hope. Moreover, the average mind would rather be wrong in a given belief than not have it at all. We believe what we wish, not what we should.

It is fortunate that we can. Were it otherwise Galileo—Copernicus aiding—would have set Christendom mad. But not a bit of it. The superstitions which they punctured are running around us still. And naturally. It is on superstition that humanity subsists—superstition by day, dreams at night.

Superstition covers a multitude of stupidities. But it is ductile and plastic. It lends itself to combinations as marvelous as they are enchanting. We are indebted to it for the masterpieces of art, for the splendor of cathedrals, for the witchery of ballads, for the sorcery of poets. We owe to it everything, even to the amenities of life.

Superstition is the essential ingredient of every virtue and every charm. It is the basis of ethics and the foundation of beauty. It has embellished existence and taken the sting from death. It is therefore in accordance with the order of things and the necessities of man.

For truth we may sigh, but it is best that we should sigh in vain. Truth is hard. It is rigid. It does not yield. On the contrary, it bites. Get in its way, and unless you have had the forethought to antisepticize yourself with indifference it will cause a hydrophobia for which the only Pasteur Institute is Time.

Superstition, on the other hand, is amiable and consolatory. We should hold to it. We should hold fast to that which is good and not try to prove anything.

Those are the words of Edgar Saltus, in the Chicago American; in some respects beautiful; in other respects absurd. Plain, unvarnished truth, divested of every phase of superstition is what the world needs.

Say Witches Still Live.

A witchcraft case, the first since colonial times, was taken cognizance of by a Carlisle, (Pa.) magistrate, when Mrs. Susan Stambaugh and her husband, of Mount Holly Springs, appeared before Magistrate Hughes against Mrs. William McBride and Edward Zug.

The Stambaughs testified that the accused persuaded them that their profiles were seen in a near-by mountain with needles stuck through their brains. These, they said, were getting rusty, and the lives of the living counterparts could only be saved by money offering before the needles broke.

Many trips were made to Mrs. McBride and large sums of money paid, with provision for its return by the disclosure of a hidden treasure.

The efforts of the impoverished Stambaughs to raise money to pay the witch doctors gave their record publicity. Mrs. McBride and Zug were held for court.

The Soul's True Self.

My friend, do you believe I rate my soul
As better than it is? Then let it be.
Nor rob me of the nobler part of me:
Better a half truth than a lying whole.

I am that part I would myself conceive;
'Tis through such errors martyrs face the flame
Smiling, and keep down cowardice for shame,
Since they in Law and in themselves believe.

What is the rose? 'Tis not a thorny bush,
But June incarnate, bidding hearts rejoice;
This small brown bird is not the woodland thrush,
But all the summer's sweetness in a voice.
The soul's true self is that which closest lies
To the dumb, mighty heart, whence all things rise.

—Lilla Cabot Perry.

Appreciation in Michigan.

To the Editor:—The premium books arrived June 17. I have the whole set now, and consider myself under lasting obligation to you. They make a fine addition to my spiritualistic library, and I am filled with wonder as to "How can he give so much for so little money?" May the good spirit friends reward you for putting such fine opportunities before those who have little of U. S. currency and a hunger for the knowledge of things spiritual, is my earnest wish.

THE OLD CHURCH BELL.

In an old country town, just over the line,
In woods smelling sweet with violets and pine,
There stands by the roadside, old and brown,
A bell that once hung in Halifax town.

Hung for years in that old church steeple,
From far and near it summoned the people,
From hamlet and farm it called them in
To hear the word, and repent of their sin.

But little is known of that old church bell—
I would that its tongue a story could tell
Of the days of old, when its faithful call
Summoned the people, one and all.

Perchance as its notes rang loud and clear,
They filled the listener's heart with fear,
Recalling the sins of his thoughtless youth
That led him away from the paths of truth.

He thought of the things he had done and said,
He thought of the hours he had wasted in bed,
He thought of his Bible laid on the shelf,
And he thought of his own unworthy self.

But he answered the call of the ringing bell,
Though he feared his soul was doomed to hell—
For he hoped to find in sermon or prayer
Some word that would lighten his load of care.

But the minister old was hard and stern,
He thought it but just that sinners should burn.
So the fear of the law he faithfully taught,
And sermon and prayer with terror were fraught.

He talked of Sinai's broken law,
He told of a place that we mentioned with awe,
Then sang of the wrath of God to come—
Then he sent his congregation home.

No wonder the sound of that iron bell,
Reminded those pious souls of hell,
For the minister sought by day and night
To guide them to heaven by Hades' light.

And the sexton grey, as he pulled the rope,
Thought over these things and expressed a hope
That the work he did in ringing the bell,
Might have helped to save some souls from hell.

But one Sabbath morn as with holy zeal,
He rang on the bell its loudest peal,
A strange sound fell on his listening ear—
"The old bell is cracked," he said, "that is clear."

He meant it was not clear, and that was so—
For on Monday they pulled it down, and lo!
They found that a crack had ended its days;
No more could it ring for prayers or praise.

So they carried it gently out of the town,
And there by the roadside laid it down,
In a cool, shady nook where the waters fell
From a brooklet near, they inverted the bell.

And there from the heart that forever is stilled,
With fresh flowing waters constantly filled,
It gives men and horses who pass that way,
A generous drink—with nothing to pay.

So now this old bell with a broader creed,
Through its emblem of truth and of love indeed,
Preaches a sermon, broader and higher
Than ever was heard 'neath the old church spire.

In its waters so cooling, fresh, and fair,
We may read of a father's loving care,
We are told of an all-controlling good,
And convinced of our human brotherhood.

—Belle V. Cushman.

"HIDE AND SEEK."

Soft steals the twilight o'er the churchyard green,
About it ghostly shadows gather gray;
No sound disturbs the stillness of the scene,
Save distant shouts of children at their play.

One little maid, more daring than the rest,
Hides where a headstone makes a safe retreat;
Braving the terrors that the place invest,
She waits the pattering sound of seekers' feet

What should she know of human anguish deep,
Common to all, to monarch as to slave?
What recks she of the dead, who silent sleep,
Who sorrow hide, and seek rest in the grave?

O! happy careless childhood, no dread thought
Of death or pain can mar your golden prime
You have no past, tear-stained and sorrow-fraught,
Nor do you fear "th' avenging hand of time."

Peaceful the dead rest in untroubled sleep.
While all about them childish laughter sounds
And the gray twilight shadows softly creep
Over God's acre, with its grassy mounds.

Mrs. Clara Watson, of Jamestown, N. Y., Rises to Explain Interesting Experiences in Her Own Education.

To the Readers of The Progressive Thinker:—

With your permission, Mr. Editor, I would like to make effort to set myself right, or make my position plain in the minds of your readers. But I almost despair of being able to accomplish my desire, for people do not read alike any more than they think or hear alike, and use as simple language as one may to express thought or opinion there is sure to be a misunderstanding on the part of many people of one's position.

The impression seems to prevail that I favor no education save that which comes from the spirit world. As stated above, I would like to try and explain my position, and to do so I purpose to refer to self. I was much interested in the brief personal experience of Prof. Loveland as given by himself in a recent issue of The Progressive Thinker, and here I wish to relate something of my own.

Unlike Mr. Loveland, I had not the advantage of even the full common school education. All the schooling that it was my privilege to obtain was prior to the age of 14 years. At this period of my life there intruded upon me an affection of the eyes, lasting several years, causing at one time almost total blindness, which difficulty prevented further school attendance. I was naturally an unusually bashful girl, retiring and shrinking in my temperament. I was reared in the Baptist faith, uniting with that church when I was 12 years old.

At the age of 25 years my attention was called to Spiritualism, a subject then of which I was absolutely ignorant. I commenced its investigation with my husband and parents, and one method of our study of the question was the establishment of the

"HOME CIRCLE."

Two evenings each week for just one year our little company of seven members sought knowledge through this channel, and the beginning of my public work to-day may be traced to that year's effort. My education in the "higher schools" commenced then and there. A power to me then strange and unexplainable yet pleasing, intensely interesting, elevating and exalting seemed to overshadow me, and I was for the hour of the sitting seemingly under the influence of an unseen power or prompter; and the circle work proved to be a veritable "training school" and there was to me a year's course of lessons in oratory, rhetoric and elocution—everything seemed included, voice culture, gesture, emphasis, etc., and yet there was no visible teacher and the voice of the instructor was never heard, for none of our number was clairvoyant or clairaudient, but I simply received and acted out the impressions made upon my mind, and in no way resisted the independent force that seemed to control the movements of the body, for what purpose I did not know at that time. And let me state here that all the time I was perfectly conscious of every thought, word and action. At the close of one year's work all manifestations ceased, and after repeated failures at sittings to further continue the effort that had proved so absorbingly interesting to us all, we reluctantly disbanded and future developments proved the wisdom of the course.

At this time I had as members of my family an invalid sister, her husband and child, and this added to my own home and family, husband and one son, and much also to od for my parents, who lived near; all this kept me busy, for I was maid of all work. These cares, labors and duties demanded largely my time and attention, but the spirit helpers did not desert me, and during ten years of this constant toil, care and discipline my "schooling" continued.

In the midst of my heaviest labors and severest burdens, ever and anon there would come into my mind a flow of sublimest thought that thrilled my very being; words (many of them) that I then knew not the meaning of; phraseology with which I was wholly unfamiliar; a style and diction superior to anything that in the past my own mind had been capable of formulating, and with all came the sense perception that it was all right; and here, kind reader, do you note how I was learning? Not alone did I have the help of the higher teachers, but my husband was my counselor, and he said to me:

"Wife, don't lose those grand thoughts! Write them down." I did so, and if time did not allow me to do so at the time of direct inspiration I would treasure them in my mind, possibly till the night time, often robbing the hours of sleep and rest to preserve them, and many, many were the gems of thought and wisdom thus garnered, that I made use of in after years.

And this was not all.

I started my investigation of Spiritualism with the determination to learn regarding it, and the was but one of the means employed. I commenced the reading and study of its literature; papers and books were brought into play and the last thirty years from one to three of the leading Spiritualistic journals have weekly found their way to our home, and great profit has been derived therefrom; and added thereto, I have read and studied and have in my possession many books and pamphlets from the following named authors: W. J. Colville, A. B. French, Hudson Tuttle, Lockwood, J. Clegg Wright, Giles B. Stebbins, J. S. Loveland, J. M. Peebles, Moses Hull, Mrs. Richmond, Mrs. Britten, Russell Wallace, William Denton and others, all of which have been "text books" in my school and great helps to me in my study of Spiritualism, and have aided my feeble intellect in the solution of many vexed questions pertaining thereto.

And then the study of Spiritualism stimulated a desire within me for information along other lines, and I read Voltaire, Thomas Paine, Robert Ingersoll, Darwin, etc. I took the Free Thinker magazine many years; read the Arena and other current literature, and with all this, I have studied the dictionary and read the Bible, not as I was wont to read it when in the church, through the preacher's glasses, but I read it to learn what it contained, and I should have added to my Spiritualistic reading the Woodhull and Claflin Weekly; for, truth to tell, I read it; and thus for thirty years I have been striving for education, and during all these years I have been receptive to the "higher word;" the grand outpouring or inflowing of inspiration continues, and while a little past the meridian of earthly life, still I have not yet graduated. Indeed, students in this kind of a college do not exhaust the curriculum thereof and receive a diploma for complete education; there is ever more to learn.

But there has been a course of study for me in this "high school" of Life not yet referred to, and that has been in my public defense of Truth with the pen, and especially the truths of Spiritualism, and I entered this class of study seemingly from sheer necessity. For years after the grand truths of Spiritualism had been established in my mind and some of its glory had come into my life, every now and then some minister of our place would come out with a tirade of abuse, vituperation, misrepresentation and falsehoods (lies fits in better) against the cause so dear to me, and my very soul groaned within me that there was no one to speak in its defense. As Spiritualists here we had to just sit passively and take the dirt and filth flung in our faces. At last one time when the attack from the sacred(?) pulpit had been unusually severe and vile, my soul just groaned aloud and I said, "It's a shame that we must hear their abuse unresented. O! for some one to go for the preachers." And my husband, ever my counselor, said:

"Why don't you do it? You remember what the medium wrote years ago, that one should be raised up in the home place to batter down the weeds of error? and who knows but that you are that one? Try it."

Good friends, I did, and for twenty years I have been at it, until now their guns are about silenced, and I am nearly out of a job in that line; but I used freely their own weapon, the Bible, as a cudgel with which to "whack" them. Whether or no I was the one prophesied that was to come, I never knew, but as yet no one else has come forth to battle.

And in this "class work," I have been astonished at the thoughts that have flooded my brain, and note here again, kind reader, how the process of education was going on. After I answered the "dear" reverends a few times they seemed sore disturbed, and then they attacked me personally; and then I had to fight the harder, and this is how I came to be radical. This is how I came to dare to tell the truth and the whole truth about the Bible, if the occasion demanded.

Let me say here I have written just as radical thought for the secular press as I have for the Spiritualistic papers, and to the credit of the home papers, be it said, they have always extended to me the courtesy of their columns, and however strong the articles none have been refused.

A good old lady at the recent New York State Convention who is a reader of The Progressive Thinker, was heard to say:

"I wouldn't think that Mrs. Watson would ever be called to speak at funerals if she talks that way."

Well, I don't. The occasion does not require. It is not necessary, nor would it be in good taste to tell all the truth about the Bible at every funeral. No doubt some of you, good readers, think that I must be a "holy terror" in my public speaking, but I assure you I am not, neither in my lectures or funerals, and I have spoken at very near four hundred of the latter.

But I want to go back to the writing class in my life "institute." Getting my start in newspaper writing in the manner stated, I came to like the work, and for this reason I widened my field of operation, and I have written articles for the secular press upon many subjects of human interest: Politics, Capital and Labor, Temperance, War, Woman Suffrage, Capital Punishment, the Sunday Question, Marriage and Divorce, Single Tax, Prayer, Heaven and Hell, God and the Devil, and Vaccination, and by the way the first public protest made in my own city against this monstrous humbug was by myself.

My writings have also entered into the departments of education, schools, child labor, prison reform, Pantheism, Theosophy, Christian Science, etc., and these writings would fill volumes, and have been given without money and without price. But I have never written a book. I speak of this to show that I am not always antagonizing the Bible or battling the church. And here again do you note, gentle reader, how in writing upon these varied subjects my education has been going on, for every article written has brought new ideas to me.

That all these years my mind has been receptive to the higher or spirit teachers I am fully confident, and yet how far I am influenced in my thought thereby I do not know. But I want to keep before you my idea of the education that comes from the schools peculiar to Spiritualism, but most assuredly NOT without effort on the part of the student. Not only did I make effort along the lines spoken of, but I made herculean effort to overcome my bashfulness and to master my diffidence or lack of confidence in myself. And along the first few years of my work as a speaker every effort was accompanied with the discordant music (if discord can be called music) of the thumping of my heart that seemed to me might be heard across the continent. But it is said that patience and perseverance can accomplish all things and I am nearly conqueror.

It may be of interest to some to know at what time in my experience I commenced public work. My first work outside of home effort was a lecture just ten years from the date of our Home Circle; but in the meantime I held some home meetings. I did not erect a "chapel" therein, for when I left the church I left it for good with all its "trappings." I had no need for a chapel, but I opened my home for any one interested to come in. My funeral work commenced a few years later than my lectures, and this is now largely my field of labor, and if it will not seem egotistical I will say that I have been told by many people that I am peculiarly adapted to this work. Any way I feel at home there, and get much to do in this line. And here I wish to refer again to the training received in gesture, intonation, etc., in the circle. Entering the field of public speaking I then first realized its meaning and its use, but, O, dear! I cannot say what is true here, because it would be considered "bragging," but there is a quality, tone and pathos to the voice as well as a style of composition or utterance not apparent in my ordinary speech. I speak of this to show how all departments in the schools peculiar to Spiritualism, fit in to the groove of public effort.

I have written this brief sketch of my experience because I could think of no better way to explain my ideas of education and training for public work, unaided by the established collegiate or theological institutions of the land; and while there is probably not another whose experience has been just like mine, still there are many other students in the high schools of Spiritualism. And note their superiority in various ways over the usual method. First, home duties and conditions made it impossible for me to have attended any school of earth. Second, the expense connected with university schooling is avoided, which is quite an item with many of us. Third, I could carry forward every labor of life that came to me, meet every obligation of home and friends, and go on with my education the same; and to me nothing can be grander, and this is why I am in love with the "old ways."

If any one should ask me who have been my spirit instructors, I should have to reply, I do not know. I have never had any "guides" with big names about me, that I know of.

I have never had any "controls" that told me that I should not read or study, and if I had I should not have obeyed them.

I have had no band of "Indians" about me that I know of.

There has been no "spirit" dictating the action of my life.

I have never sacrificed my individuality to that of another, not even to my husband, and consequently I have not obeyed the "divine" command, "Wives submit yourselves unto your husbands in all things."

I use my own judgment in all matters, faulty, no doubt, but it is mine to use. I have never given a "sitting" nor a "test." I wish I could, for I am often asked to do this, but I cannot.

At one place where I was lecturing, I explained that I was no test medium, but one good old soul so anxious for some message from the loved ones, said: "I should think you might give just a few tests," and how I wished I could, the old lady was so earnest. And this is one branch of deplorable effort upon which my school can be of no use to me, simply because there is nothing in my organism that responds to this line of work, and here comes in adaptability or natural endowment which is an important factor in successful effort. But with all helpers, invisible, have been and are near, and while I do not suppose there is a "mahatma" among them, yet these "higher teachers" have imparted lessons at once helpful, uplifting, instructive, exalting and enduring. All hail, then, to Spiritualism, the one system having power within it to educate its workers. And now, readers, I wonder if I have made my position clear; if I have not, then I am sure I cannot.

Now in closing I wish to say a few words upon the Morris Pratt Institute, and I say all honor is due Mr. Pratt for his munificent gift to the cause of education. I am told that this institute belongs to the Spiritualists at large. Then I suppose any Spiritualist has a right to express opinion regarding its management. Personally I have not a word of fault to find with the officers or faculty chosen. They are all, no doubt, competent, but my thought of its management is this. Let the school be maintained upon the broad principles of Naturalism, of Humanitarianism, upon the philosophy and science of life, and not hampered by theology or sectarianism. Let there be no "chapel" service with its waste of time in senseless forms, rituals and ceremonies of worship, but convert the chapel into a lecture hall and seance room, and place upon its rostrum able instructors upon all questions of human interest, upon all problems that pertain to human betterment, and this will help to attract exalted helpers from the spirit side. A person taught only upon the principles of Spiritualism in its narrow sense of an ism is not fully equipped for a teacher or minister in Spiritualism, but there needs to be the broad range of general knowledge. Teach Bible if the students desire better understanding of it, for it is a fine weapon of defense against the enemy, but let it be robbed of all "sanctity" and taught in the light of reason. Discard orthodox imitations in the school.

Be original.

Be genuine.

Imitations are cheap and the intelligent, progressive element of society will scoff at Spiritualists for adopting them as a thin veneer of "respectability." No matter if it may be called "atheistic" by the church people. Atheism is nearer to the true principles of Spiritualism than is the concept of the Christian God.

I am sure that a school officered by intelligent Spiritualists can be so disciplined and conducted as to command the respect of all classes, even the church people without patterning after the latter. Let the experiment be tried anyway. It seems to me that such an institution of learning could and would receive the co-operation of the Spiritualists at large both with influence and those who could, with money.

It is more than likely that some people desiring to come into Spiritualism as workers and teachers can and will take advantage of the aid of the new school, but others will be prevented from so doing as the writer has been, and will continue as students in the "higher schools," and thus fit themselves for the work, and others still, with small mental power, with lack of good judgment, not not knowing their own unfitness, not sensing how ridiculous a spectacle they present before intelligence, will continue to advertise themselves to the public as authorized representatives of Spiritualism, for many of this class have received their diploma in "ordination," and this is so easy to acquire, and thus ignorance will still here and there manifest itself; and while it is humiliating to intelligent Spiritualists, and while personally I consider it my business to do all I can to prevent it getting there, and while in no way will I lend aid or influence to place it there, still ignorance will never destroy or tear down Spiritualism; there are too many intelligent and talented workers at the front upholding it, and accessions of this calibre are coming along.

Now, kind friends, have I made my position clear? All of which is respectfully submitted.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning," Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

CHRISTIANITY.

Reply to Bro. Hodge's Criticism.

I wish to say a word anent Brother W. C. Hodge's kindly criticism of my late article on religion. It was not my intention to rob Spiritualism of a single honor by saying it introduced no new idea as to the future state. I said it merely confirmed or demonstrated the truth of certain ideas or beliefs which were already here in the minds and hearts at the advent of Modern Spiritualism. And that contention was true and remains true, Mr. Hodge to the contrary notwithstanding.

Spiritualism, as a matter of fact, has always existed; but we mean Modern Spiritualism, the institution that began some fifty years ago with the Rochester raps, together with its mediums, seances, lecturers, papers and books. This is Spiritualism and this is what I had in mind.

Now people believed the soul to be immortal long before Spiritualism made its debut in 1850. Plato taught it B. C. 380, of whom Emerson said: "Out of Plato come all things that are still written and debated among men of thought." So also nations of men believed in a world of disembodied spirits, prior even to the Christian era, and that death was a gateway to Hades, Paradise or Elysium. It is unnecessary to more than state these two propositions and the fact becomes patent that spiritualism neither created nor introduced either one of those concepts into the world.

There remains but one other point I made to be noticed, and this is the one. Mr. Hodge assails so vigorously. Let us see. I said "to live a good life here was the way to prepare for the best life over there," and I affirmed that this was the teaching of Christianity. Mr. Hodge demurs and insists that the Christian scheme makes faith instead of character the basis of salvation; or, to use his own words, "depending upon the atoning blood of a sacrificed savior" who "died and paid it all." He claims Spiritualism exploded that doctrine. Not so, however.

In the first place it is not Christianity. Jesus never taught it. He said: "Work in my vineyard * * * whatsoever is right I will give thee." "I will reward every man as his works may be." New Testament writers said: "Work out your own salvation." "Abraham, our father, was justified by works." And so on.

Salvation by belief or faith is not the doctrine of Christianity. It is the theology of Calvin and Watson, the staple article in the creed of Methodism, of Presbyterianism and other isms. But it is not Christianity as expounded by Christ himself, by James, by Channing, by Theodore Parker, by Beecher, by an unbroken succession of good and great men in every age.

Finally, here is the Christian church, sometimes nick-named Campbellites, for whom I have been preaching twenty-five years. We are more than a million strong. We repudiate the "saved by faith only" scheme utterly. Methodists and others revile us because we teach "salvation by works." They sneer at our religion as a "do religion." But we go on teaching a "do religion" and proclaiming that salvation is secured by character and not by faith only. Modern Spiritualism was ushered in only fifty-four years ago, whereas Mr. Alexander Campbell started the movement now known as the Christian church seventy-five years ago, in 1827. So the protest against "salvation by faith," or substituting belief for works and character, antedates by 28 years the development of Modern Spiritualism. So when Mr. Hodge says that the introduction of this noble idea, or protest, "is precisely what Spiritualism did do," he is mistaken. It is precisely what Spiritualism did not do.

But I wish to be perfectly fair and also to furnish a little light on our teaching. I am asked, "Do you not, then, require belief in Christ in your church?" The reply is, Certainly. But note how it is required. It is not as a substitute for work but as a prelude to work, an incentive to action. To illustrate: I say to a sick person. Believe in Dr. Campbell and you will be saved. As a result he goes up to Albany, consults that splendid physician, takes his medicine, obeys his instruction as to diet, exercise, etc. He gets well. Belief was of no value, abstractly, only as it led on to doing certain things. Obedience, not belief, saves. So we say, Believe on Christ. Why? That you may accept his teaching and copy his example. And that is all. Belief does not relieve from duty, but only urges on to duty. Righteousness is not imputed through faith, it is wrought out by works of good. The only power of Jesus to save is the power of his teaching and personal example. Salvation is character and the reward of character.

Rest easy, Brother Hodge. All of those hopes, beliefs, precious as they are, were here long before Modern Spiritualism arose. And if your Spiritualism can take this ancient hope and belief and change it into absolute certainty, so that we may say "I know" instead of "I believe," is that not glory enough? I am convinced that this is about to be done, has been done in many cases, and while I still "don't know," I am nevertheless thankful that you have greatly strengthened my "I believe."

WAS HE?

Thomas Paine—Was He Junius?

On the 21st of January, 1872, exactly one hundred years after the date of the last letter of Junius, the discovery that he was Thomas Paine was first made public in the city of Washington, and the first printed copy of the book containing the proof was exhibited to an audience of forty people. The book, which had been stereotyped several weeks, opens with these words:

"One hundred years ago Junius wrote as follows: * * * * * * *

"Washington, D. C., January 21, 1872."

The writer of this article who made the announcement, did not hear of the discovery before January 2, 1872, when Joel Moody, Esq., of Kansas, was introduced to him as about to publish a book entitled, "Junius Unmasked; or Thomas Paine the Author of the Letters of Junius, and the Declaration of Independence." Mr. Moody did not wish to be known for a while, and I voluntarily became god-father to the bantling.

"I am the sole depositor of my secret," said Junius, "and it shall perish with me."

Thomas Paine was the most secretive of men. Few people are aware that the man whose pen was as mighty as the sword of Washington in achieving American independence, was scarcely known as a writer until more than eight years after the close of the war. In 1791 he burst forth like a meteor in the literary and political world by the publication of the "Right of Man," in answer to Edmund Burke on the French Revolution. All through the American war he signed himself "Common Sense," and his only open publication prior to his return to England was a "Dissertation on Government; the Affairs of the Bank and Paper Money."

Paine became a convert to republicanism after coming to America. Allowing for this change of sentiment, it is safe to say that there is not a political principle expressed by Junius which is not reproduced in the "Rights of Man." And if Paine did not write Junius, nature produced twins of the same mental type to do the same work for mankind, one of whom was unknown to the world until he produced the "Rights of Man," at the age of fifty-four, and the other was first made known exactly one hundred years, to a day, after the date of the last letter of Junius.

There are nearly three hundred parallels of character, conduct, opinion, etc., between the two writers, and not a solitary fact has been found incompatible with their identity.

Junius declined to share with his publisher the profits of an authorized edition of his Letters. Paine said in 1807: "I take neither copyright nor profit from anything I publish." Not one writer in a thousand would act thus. But here are two contemporary examples. Multiply 1,000 by 1,000 and you have a million to one that Paine was Junius.

The contention that Philip Francis was Junius is completely ended by the discovery in 1895 of two Junius letters printed after the regular series and in another newspaper than the "Public Advertiser," in which all the previous ones appeared. One of the two letters appeared five months after Sir Philip had embarked for India, and it adverted to events since his departure. The other letter, a year earlier, was on "Priestcraft," a topic which Junius had treated so gingerly that no one could tell whether he was a Christian or a skeptic. But this letter foreshadowed Paine's "Age of Reason," which came twenty years later. Francis was a high churchman. He had recently visited the Pope and he commended the Papacy.

As to Paine's character, I affirm that it is without a smirch.

Franklin doubtless detected Junius, but he was almost as discretive as Paine. The two men worked together even when far apart. Without their secret work American independence would not have been achieved. Is it, therefore, an exaggeration to say that Paine and Franklin made this nation?

A Worker's Brief Notes.

I have just returned home after an absence of several months—only good reports to make of all societies where I have labored. At Wheeling, the society, though young, has done a grand work, and it has a very earnest and efficient corps of officers. With a God bless you I left for Allegheny, Pa. My work there was phenomenal, considering the season of the year, and it was with a feeling of sincere regret I closed the meetings to return home for a much needed rest. The cause seemed prospering everywhere, and earnest workers are spreading the gospel of Spiritualism broadcast.

At Wheeling I saw one of the new leaflets or Sunday-school lessons sent out by John W. Ring, of Galveston, Texas. It was a splendid production and well worthy the consideration of all spiritual lyceum instructors; its teachings are of the highest import to all both young and old.

The Psychic Era, published at Pittsburg, seems to have filled the bill to the satisfaction of its many friends. I met its genial editor, both in public and private, and believe he is destined to do a grand work.

With congratulations from all sides, I wended my way home to meet with the First Spiritual Philosophical Society of Detroit, of which I am still pastor, to enjoy with them our annual picnic to be held in the near future. I shall continue to lecture for this, the first spiritual society of this city, whenever I can find the opportunity to do so, but with their consent I shall spend a portion of my time elsewhere, as I need a change of climate. Any society in need of my services during the coming winter—Southern states prefered—will kindly address me at my residence, 411 13th street, Detroit, Mich., as soon as possible, so I can make arrangements accordingly.

I found the dear old Progressive Thinker circulated everywhere. We are justly proud of this our western publication, and I hear only good reports of its fearlessness in presenting the truth, from all sides.

As the camp season draws near I hope each camp will do a good work. I have just read the program of Island Lake camp. It has a fine array of talent and expects to have a successful meeting. As it is nearest to Detroit, I expect to take a run out there for a day or two. NELLIE S. BAADE.

"Invisible Helpers." By C. W. Leadbeater, the noted Theosophist lecturer and writer. Very interesting. Price 55 cents. For sale at this office.

A Noble Worker Passed On.

The First Church of Spiritualists of this city has just sustained a great loss in the death of Mr. John H. McElroy, one of the charter members, and for many years president of the society. No one who knew Mr. McElroy could doubt where he stood in regard to Spiritualism. For fifteen years, in public and in private he was its foremost avowed advocate. It was, consequently, a great disappointment that his funeral services were not conducted under spiritual auspices and that some spiritual speaker was not permitted to voice the teachings of the philosophy of Spiritualism on that occasion.

But such was not the case; an Episcopal minister officiated and contented himself with simply reading a portion of the burial service of his church, and reading a few verses from the Bible. Not a word was uttered as to the life or work of our arisen brother, nor were his noble traits of character in any way alluded to.

It would have been a grand occasion to have voiced the cheering and uplifting truths of Spiritualism, and this many of us know would have been in accord with his many times expressed wishes. But family influences, opposed to father's belief, prevented, and thus robbed themselves as well as others, of something a little more definite than the Episcopal Prayer Book has to offer, of the state and condition of their departed loved one. Let other Spiritualists, whose family religious ties run in a different channel, take warning, and where there is any reason to believe that natural affection will not suffice to have their wishes respected, take action prior to demise that will insure the same being carried out.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

The twenty-fourth annual camp-meeting of the Spiritualists and Liberals of Kansas, will be held at Delphos, commencing August 8, and continuing to the 24th. It will be in a beautiful grove one-fourth mile from town. One and one-third fare for distance of 100 miles on all railroads. Arrangements have been made with the idea of making this the best camp ever held here. J. N. Blanchard, president; H. D. Dwight, secretary.

The Secretary of the Spiritualist Training School writes under date of July 1, from Lily Dale, that "the session is drawing near its close. We have a comparatively large class the present year, and a most interesting one. General regrets are expressed that the present session must be the last at Lily Dale. We have been more than ordinarily encouraged the present season. Commencement exercises will occur on the 10th of this month. Particulars later."

A fine point has been raised by Mr. Charles Michel, of Ellenville, N. Y., in his refusal to pay the Rev. Herman C. Fultz $6 for preaching the sermon at the funeral of his—Mr. Michel's— little boy. The child was drowned, apparently through no fault of his own or of parents, but the reverend gentleman seems to have seen the workings of the hand of Providence in the matter. In his funeral sermon he chided the bereaved parents for neglecting to have their son baptized, and made some remarks concerning the punishment of those who are sinners by omission. In suing for the $6 which he named as his schedule price for funeral sermons over drowned boys, Rev. Mr. Fultz set up the claim that 'the laborer is worthy of his hire.' The defendant, on the other hand, maintained that he had not hired the preacher to cast reflections. He insisted that he did not believe he was in duty bound to pay for being lectured and called names while the body of his dead son lay before him. There can be no doubt that he and Mrs. Michel had reason to feel hurt, but the jury disagreed, and only one man stood out against the preacher.

Mrs. Celia M. Pine writes from Jersey City, N. J.: "In 1844, my sister's husband, who was a volunteer fireman, lived with his family in part of the engine house in Elgeridge street, New York. Just across the street there was a very plain-looking frame house. It had been empty some time and my brother-in-law took a notion in his head to hire it. He leased it and moved his family in, but did not stay long, as there were noises as if a fight, and as though a heavy body tumbled down stairs and banged against the doors. My little nephew, who was only two years old, and who seemed to have second sight, told his mother there was a man with his throat bleeding, under the stairs. My brother-in-law sold his lease, and the party only stayed a few days. The house was torn down, and while enlarging the foundation the skeleton of a man was found, and on investigation, it was ascertained that the house had formerly been a sailor's boarding hotel. Some poor fellow had lost his life in a scuffle."

J. W. Boyd writes: "I have seen many liberal papers, but to speak it very mildly, yours outdoes all others combined."

Believers in telepathic influences, conveying strange and often accurate impressions of things about to happen, between persons closely connected in sympathy will find much to strengthen their belief in the experience of Mrs. W. S. Mann, of Hot Springs, Ark. In the last week of February W. S. Mann was taken to a hospital at Butte, Mont., as an utter stranger. On February 28 he died and was buried, the police believing that he had no relatives living. On February 24, as it now appears, Mrs. Mann, in Hot Springs, Ark., wrote a letter to her husband, addressing it to Butte and telling of the fears for his safety that possessed her. She said: "Why don't you write me? Write and tell me that it is not true, and that it is nothing but a cruel dream after all. Last Sunday night, shortly after midnight, I had the most horrible dream. I saw you lying cold in death before me. Again the next night I had the same dream and I cried out for fear. Again last night the horrible vision came to me with all its hideous details, and I was stricken with a feeling of terror. Then I knew that something had happened and that you were lost to me." Pathetically, the letter went on to tell how, in a series of awful dreams, she had seen the cold earth close over her husband's body; that, after it had been buried for a day, the body turned over in the coffin and its face expressed intense agony. The repeated conviction that her husband was lost to her forever was pitiful to read for the officers, who learned for the first time that the dead man had living relatives. Mrs. Mann has now been advised of the truth of the mysterious dreams.

On Sunday, July 6, at the regular afternoon meeting of the St. Louis Progressive Union, in Howard Hall, Mrs. Caroline Morgan and Mrs. Florence L. Padman were ordained ministers of the gospel of Spiritualism, the Rev. W. F. Peck, of the First Church of Spiritual Unity, officiating. Both have been mediums many years, and Mrs. Padman is President of the Progressive Union. The attendance was large and included members of the two oldest organizations in the city.

Stella A. Fisk, secretary, writes from Keokuk, Iowa: "The Iowa State Association is still working on to build up our cause in our especial territory. Our regular missionaries are doing a great deal of very effective work in a quiet way this summer that will bear fruit later on. We are much pleased to say that Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates will fill some dates in Iowa this month, where their work in the past has been so well received. They will be at Des Moines July 10 to 17; at Clear Lake from the 18 to 23, and at Northwood from the 24th to the 29th. We would ask of all of our friends in these localities to see to it that they have a large hearing. Mr. and Mrs. Kates will also be at the M. V. S. A. camp-meeting from August 19 to 24, where they will lecture and Mrs. Kates will follow each of their lectures with such tests and messages as the spirit forces shall give her. A meeting of the executive board of the state association will be held at Clinton camp on the second of August, which is State Day. We ask the people of Iowa to give attention to this day as the association will be well represented by its president and others. And those who stay away will surely miss a treat."

F. W. Detray writes: "Owing to the rain June 28, the pic-nic for the Sunday-school of the Church of the Soul was postponed and will be held at Mill Creek Park, Saturday, July 19. Train leaves Wells street depot, C. & N. W. road, at 7:35 and 7:45 a. m. Stops at Maplewood station at 7:50 and 8 a. m. Tickets, adults 50 cents; children, 25 cents. Sunday-school children free. All are invited."

J. Knudson writes: "I like The Progressive Thinker very much. It is like a two-edged sword—it cuts on both sides, and I think clears the ground for the truth to shine."

Dr. P. J. Barrington, who is now at 409 Seventh street, Sioux City, Iowa, writes: "I want to thank you for your kindness in making an appeal for assistance in my behalf on account of my sick and helpless condition. I have received thirteen dollars up to date—all from entire strangers except one, an old, tried friend. To all of these dear-hearted and sympathetic friends I want to offer my heart-felt thanks and deep gratitude; not only for their offerings, but for the many kind words of sympathy and encouragement that come with it. Dear friends, you never can know how much good it has done me. I am much better than I was two or three weeks ago. All of the grave and alarming symptoms which I had then have changed for the better, and I am quite hopeful; but still I am very weak and feeble; but I do feel so encouraged that if I can in some way pull through July and August without relapse and still improve as I have for the last three weeks, I know that by the middle of September I shall be better than I have been for several years, and can take care of myself."

Julian W. Smith writes: "The State Spiritualist Association of Washington will hold its First Annual camp-meeting at Green Lake, Seattle, commencing Sunday, July 27, and ending August 24. As all the societies in the State have joined us, we anticipate a glorious time, and will spread the truths of Spiritualism more than has ever been done in the Northwest, as there are a great many enthusiastic workers in this state. Any speaker or psychic coming this way would be welcome, and we will entertain them loyally."

L. R. Hillier writes from Gloucester, Mass.: "The following clipping was taken from the press dispatch column of a daily paper: 'A wealthy woman named Silva recently died at Lisbon. She was a fervid Spiritualist, a believer in the transmigration of souls, and imagined that the soul of her dead husband had entered a rooster. She caused a special fowl house to be built and ordered her servants to pay extra attention to their 'master's' wants. A lawsuit might have followed had not one of the heirs adopted the simple expedient of having the wealthy rooster killed, thus becoming himself, the next of kin.' How any person of ordinary intelligence can believe that the soul of a man could be incarnated in a rooster, is beyond my comprehension. The idea of a soul becoming reincarnated in a human body is ridiculous enough, but to think that the spirit of a man could enter a body so low in the scale of being, is utterly foolish."

Lyman C. Howe remains at Paw Paw, Mich., until July 17, and then fills an engagement at the Chesterfield camp.

A. W. Keller writes: "The Ladies' Auxiliary of the Englewood Union gave an entertainment and supper on the evening of July 10. The attendance was good, and a jolly social time was enjoyed by all present. The entertainment commenced in the afternoon, with various speakers and mediums. Supper was then furnished by the ladies of the society; after supper a literary feast and dance. The music was furnished by the Kershaw school band. The ladies outdid themselves in every way. This was the last of their meetings for the summer; open again in October. Sunday, July 13, is to be the last meeting of our society for the summer months, and we will then have to bid good-bye to Rev. H. J. Moore. It is very hard to part with such an earnest worker, and a man of such integrity and sociability, and we wish him success wherever his work may be going on."

Will J. Erwood writes from La Crosse, Wis.: "The program for the Waukesha camp is now complete, and those who contemplate an outing this summer will do well to consider the attractions of Waukesha. The camp grounds are situated in a fine grove within the city limits, and within a short distance of the electric car line, a fifteen-minute ride over which takes you to the famed Pewaukee Lake. The famous Waukesha Springs are within a short distance of the camp grounds. One cannot appreciate the beauty of the scenery in this favored section of Wisconsin unless they have visited it personally. The programs are ready for distribution. They are replete with fine views of the many points of interest in and about Waukesha. If you have not secured one, send in your name and address, and a copy will be sent you at once. Every convenience will be found on the grounds, and every effort will be made to make the campers as comfortable as possible, and a grand time is assured every one. The grounds will be brilliantly lighted by electricity, which will add materially to the comfort of all. Again let me call your attention to the wisdom in securing your tents in advance. It will save much confusion. A first-class restaurant will be conducted by experienced and competent persons. Persons who do not want to rent tents, may bring their own tents, and will be charged a nominal sum for use of grounds. Rates will be secured. Watch future announcements. So many inquiries have come to me about the distance of the camp grounds from the railroads, that I wish to emphasize the following. There are three trunk lines: The Chicago & Northwestern, the Wisconsin Central, and the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul railroads that run daily trains through Waukesha, and all the depots are within one mile of the grounds. Visitors by walking one block from the depots before taking bus will be carried to the grounds for 10 cents, but if they take the bus at the depot, the trip will cost 25 cents. This is because of a bus combine which has regulated the fare to and from the depots."

G. R. Wright, of Columbus, Ohio, speaks well of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Hatfield Pettibone at that place.

W. S. Young writes from Kingston, Ill.: "In spite of rain and threatening weather and outward conditions for all concerned, Mrs. Georgia G. Cooley talked for nearly two hours to a goodly number of interested listeners at Uplinger's Hall, Kingston, Ill., July 9. Mrs. Cooley as a speaker is thoroughly earnest, honest, forcible and eloquent, and the people of Kingston now know and appreciate it. They were interested while she was speaking, and are more interested now. They do not forget the speaker and they cannot and have no wish to forget her message of truth and comfort, and they speak of it with sacred tenderness and touched hearts. She planted in the hearts of her audience a tree of knowledge whose leaves are for the betterment and healing of human souls, and she left behind the wherewith for its nourishment, which seems on every hand to multiply and replenish itself after the manner of the five loaves and few little fishes of the Christ."

Correspondent writes: "The Spiritualists of Pittsburg and Allegheny, Pa., join forces and on the 13th have a day in the woods, at Sheridan Park. Mrs. E. J. Demorest and many other prominent workers will be present, and a grand time is expected."

O. Merritt writes from Genoa, Ill.: "We have just had the pleasure of having with us Mrs. Georgia G. Cooley, who gave us two of the most inspiring lectures ever delivered in Genoa. The people of Genoa appreciate her worth, and hope soon to have her with them again."

L. L. Bair writes from Findlay, Ohio: "We will have a one-day camp-meeting at Reeves' Park Sunday, July 20. Mr. and Mrs. Sprague and other mediums and speakers will be present."

I. W. Hatch writes from Queen City Park Hotel, Burlington, Vt.: "The camp-meeting at Queen City Park will be in session during the whole month of August. There was never a time when cottages were so fully occupied as at this season. People have learned more and more of this beautiful and healthful location until the name itself suggests what it really is, the Queen of all parks. Anyone wishing to know more of this place and its many attractions will do well to write to me."

James Watson writes: "A very enjoyable day was spent at Jackson park, July 4, the occasion being the annual picnic of the Englewood Spiritual Society. The weather was perfect. Everyone, from the oldest to the youngest, seemed to vie with each other to see which could have the most fun; not even the presence of a Baptist minister trying his best to convert some of our spiritual sisters could mar the pleasure of the occasion; in fact, some of the sisters rather enjoyed the oddity of this reverend trying to convert them. He remarked there was one thing he liked about the Spiritualists, and that was their idea of progression. Most of the meetings have closed for the summer, and many of the workers have departed to the various camps. Dr. Burgess and Mrs. Maggie Waite still continue their meetings to large and appreciative audiences. A beautiful christening ceremony was performed last Sunday evening by Mrs. Waite, after which the usual lecture and tests. Excellent reports are given of the good work of these two mediums, who expect to continue their meetings during July."

S. writes from North Amherst, Ohio: "We have been truly made happy by the visit of our old friend and worker, Anna Gillespie, of San Francisco, who has been with us for a too brief visit. We all love her, and hope she can soon be with us for future lectures. The faithful ones of this place are not many in numbers, but strong in knowledge of the spiritual truth, and such visitors as Anna L. Gillespie are always welcome."

Mrs. Wm. H. Pierce, of Worcester, Mass., writes: "I received The Pro-Progressive Thinker, and also the book, 'A Wanderer in the Spirit Lands.' I am much pleased with both, and look forward from week to week for the paper."

Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates, missionaries of the N. S. A., will speak in Hopkins' Hall, 528 West Sixty-third street, on the evenings of July 30 and 31.

Lily Dale Camp.

The opening day at Camp Cassadaga was very enjoyable. The hitherto frowning skies were as clear and sunny as possible. The smiling faces, cordial greetings, and sweet good-will manifested on every side, were good testimony to the pleasure felt by the many people who are again congregated here, at once more being able to partake of the "feast of good things" which only Camp Cassadaga can give.

The exercises of the day began with a Pioneers' meeting in the forenoon, followed in the afternoon by a lecture from our popular Sister Twing, Brother Grimshaw presiding.

Everything passed off in a happy manner, ending with a pleasant reception at the hotel parlor in the evening.

So the ball has been set rolling, under very favorable auspices, for the camp of 1902. Many strangers are here for the first time, many returning with friends, and many calls for programs from a distance, all attesting to the wide-spread interest felt for the cause.

THE LAST GREAT CHANGE.

Some Reflections on the Nature of Death.

A friend has just entered into the newness of life through the mystic channel called death. Sometimes I wish that word death had never been coined; to me it seems misleading. But I started out to tell your readers what were my thoughts this morning as I stood by the inanimate form of one who had been a strong and useful pillar in the household of a respected and esteemed Presbyterian friend of mine. I stood by the casket that contained all that was mortal of one who was the support, in a mental way, of the family. She wondered, no doubt, if the doctrine of John Calvin, accepted by her in her youth and practiced by her through a long life of seventy years, had shed a halo on the mystic bridge that spans the two worlds.

I mentally axed, "Is it well with you?" but no voice came to me to tell me of her short experience in that new world.

In this chamber of death beautiful flowers perfumed the air with their fragrance, and I thought that, amid the stillness of death, there seemed a language in the silence that pervaded the room. The flowers spoke eloquently of the goodness of God to the race, but no words uttered by the surviving friends assured me that this faithful woman had taken with her all that she ever possessed in this life, except the old, worn-out body. The surviving friends believe in the resurrection of the body, in the great day of judgment sometime, somewhere—they know not when nor where this event will take place. Their Calvinistic creeds throw no light on this all-important question. They believe that they will once again see her old body. They seem to forget Paul, when he said, "There is a natural body and there is a spiritual body."

Dear reader, if you are an orthodox believer—if you believe in the doctrine of John Calvin; if you believe in the resurrection of the mortal, natural body, and in the uncertainty of a life of growth and development in the next world, are you satisfied with your belief? No! we know you cannot be satisfied with a doctrine that has enshrouded the tomb with darknes and gloom.

For more than half a century Spiritualism has shed its light along the pathway of the tomb. It has proved that if a man die he will live again, and under proper conditions does return and hold sweet converse with friends on earth. It teaches that death makes no change except of conditions; it teaches that whatever a man sows that shall he also reap. If a man sows the golden grains of love and harmony in this life, he will reap a harvest of great joy in the hereafter, whether he be a Spiritualist, a Methodist, or a Presbyterian. To be good, we must be free; freedom means goodness. Religious creeds make bondmen and bondwomen. Calvinistic creeds forbid investigation into so-called sacred lore.

When death opens the portals of the other world, the non-progressive Christian closes his spiritual eyes to the mystery of death, and tries to persuade himself that he is pleasing God by robbing himself of the knowledge of a future life. To be free means to be just, kind, generous, or in other words, to practice the Golden Rule, and when men and women do this, the somber curtain will be lifted from the tomb, and the bridge of souls will be illuminated, and when a soul goes out instead of weeping, there will be joy and rejoicing.

Lily Dale Camp.

Sunday, the 6th, was a delightful day for the campers at Lily Dale. Mrs. Jahnke entertained us in the large auditorium, with choice selections of recitations.

The forest temple meeting was conducted by Mrs. Reed. She was assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Noyes and J. M. Temple. Sunday is the day for crowds. The social life is by no means less attractive; boating, fishing, bathing and euchre parties are in vogue. An excellent library filled with the latest works of the "new thought," is under the supervision of the Librarian, Mrs. Webb-Baker. The investigator who is anxious to learn of the unseen world will be unable to decide between the different phases of mediumship—all are represented here—slate-writing, trance mediumship, automatic and independent writing, trumpet, and materialization, and the best speakers, under inspiration. People come from all parts of the world, even from the Oriental countries, to witness the manifestations of every phase and thought; the rich and the poor, the sick and the well.

A. A. Gaston, president; M. T. Skidmore and their assistants have left nothing undone to make this camp a harmonious center. One of the banner days is the time set aside for the different themes on woman's suffrage. The services of Miss Anna Shaw, well known to us all, have been procured for "Woman's Day." This was the happy thought of Mrs. Marion Skidmore, who has passed on to the other life, but has left her counterpart, her loving husband, to finish her work she so nobly begun.

CORRESPONDENT.

Spirit Message from Ingersoll.

The following communication was received by Mrs. Chas. W. Klee, of Washington, D. C., June 17, 1902, at a sitting for independent slate-writing with P. L. O. A. Keeler:

"Good morning. Do not ask me am I happy? There is not absolute happiness even in the realm of heaven and never can be while a vestige of sorrow and suffering and trouble exists on earth among those we love and care for. To sit at the throne of God in heaven and be happy, to praise him and smile at the wailing and the torture and horror and appeals of a good old mother, or a sweetheart, or a loving wife, because that dear one did not believe in Christ crucified, and went to hell, is a disgrace to human nature and a stultifying of every noble and sympathetic principle within us, a mockery of all that is good and true and pure. I am searching for a different heaven and a better God. Ah!

"R. G. INGERSOLL."

Mrs. Klee was surprised; she had not sought a message from Col. Ingersoll. She had never seen him in her life, but her husband had. He compared the hand-writing with that of Col. Ingersoll in life, and the resemblance was striking, especially the signature. On another slate Mrs. Klee got a message written in German, which she read and translated to me. W. H. BURR.

ITINERANT NOTES.

Lyman C. Howe on His Travels.

I left home June 20, stayed in Buffalo over night and was entertained at the hospitable home of Mrs. J. H. R. Matteson; had a short visit with her and Mrs. Atcheson, and then she was off to Jamestown, where she goes once each month to examine and treat from 50 to 100 patients, who know and value her rare gifts and effective remedies.

A pleasant trip by the Wabash to Detroit, and I found that a superb road, making the easiest journey through Canada that I have taken by rail. Landing at Dr. Burrows' Occult Temple, 132 Michigan avenue, I was cared for at his daughter's elegant home until Sunday afternoon, and then spoke in the Occult Temple to a fine audience, in the evening. The Doctor is somewhat sacerdotal in his methods and appearance, but he is really radical and an all-around Spiritualist. He uses the Bible in his meetings, but does not allow it to use him. We may all get valuable lessons from that remarkable book, if we use it wisely, and I always feel sorry for a man who is so ruled by prejudice that he cannot appreciate the good, however much it be mixed with error.

After the majority had left the Temple, about twenty remained to share ice cream and cake supplied by the Doctor as an aftermath—an inspiration that digested the spiritual supplies, and gave to religion a tangibility decidedly pleasant. Ice cream will draw larger audiences than the best oratory, and exercise a better influence on faith than long prayers and hungry stomachs. Dr. Burrows has got it down fine. He knows what human nature needs and what will attract and interest the people. Something good to eat and drink, has more charms to draw the average Christian or sinner than the highest spiritual blessing. Ice cream and kindred goodies will draw on the pocket-book and make men generous, when religion will not evoke a nickel. People will pay for what they like; and what they most desire will draw the largest expenditure of cash.

Pop-corn and chewing gum, lemonade and soda water, will command a much more remunerative patronage than books, papers, magazines, and even Bibles.

Arriving at Paw Paw, Monday evening, I was generously entertained at the hospitable home of Dr. B. O'Dell, and thence to Bankson's Lake, where I met some brave, earnest souls, seeking truth under difficulties, and enjoying their discomfort caused by the cold and continuous storms, by keeping up a lively sociability, and seeking warmth and light from heaven.

Dr. B. O'Dell directed affairs, presided at all meetings, and kept a lively interest inspiring the campers, which left no room for discomfort or murmuring, and a better class of seekers is rarely found. Mrs. Fixen, of Chicago, was conspicuous as an entertainer at table and all other places, and good cheer was abundant. The work of mediums and speakers, so far as I heard, was excellent, and in spite of rain and chill the camp was pronounced a success. Dr. O'Dell had it hardest of any as he assumed the financial responsibility, and did most of the hard work. The table board was of the very best—rarely equaled at any camp. Mrs. Nims is a professional cook and was engaged by Dr. O'Dell especially to make the dining-room a special attraction, and every meal was a feast for the gods.

After the close of this camp I rested at Dr. O'Dells and grew strong for work.

At Lake Cora, July 6, we held a picnic meeting, with two lectures, sweet music by Mrs. Dr. Marvin and several children, and a lively social season. It was a feast of soul to meet the old-time friends and pioneers, such as Brother Burdick, E. L. Warner and wife, Mrs. Sirene, Mrs. Sheffer, of South Haven, Miss Minnie Nesbitt, Brother Wood and others who have been ever faithful to the cause I love. I was surprised to meet my little friend from St. Louis, Mo., Miss Emily Mukish, who is taking an outing at South Haven.

Mrs. M. L. O'Dell was president and general director at this meeting, and her persuasive voice and manner, and fine elocutionary efforts, added much to the pleasure and profit of the meetings. She read two fine poems, in an impressive style, which were appreciated and enjoyed by the audience. This was my first visit to both of these resorts, where Spiritualists have for many years held meetings and disseminated the gospel of love and truth.

I am due at Chesterfield camp Sunday, July 2 to 25 inclusive; after which I go home and to Lily Dale. To those who have written me for contributions, and other work, within the past three months, I would say that I have not neglected you willingly; but have been especially handicapped, and so imprisoned by fate that I could not do as I would. Of this you may know more later.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

Maple Dell Camp, O.

For the past thirteen years this camp has held its annual sessions, and thousands of people have been blest with the inspiration that has come from the lips of the best speakers and mediums in America. On account of the illness and death of some of our officers and co-workers, the cause of Spiritualism in this locality seemed to be passing through a temporary calm. And in looking over the history of Spiritualism, we have decided to go back to first principles, and make the camp this year, almost entirely for young speakers and mediums.

We propose to manage the camp this year in the old-fashioned way, thereby developing new speakers and unfolding mediumship. It is a fact that Spiritualism never progressed so rapidly as when the best conditions were made; and the spirit world had an opportunity to be largely in the ascendency.

Our programs are not quite ready yet for distribution. We have secured the services of some very reliable mediums and speakers, and hope to make the coming session of camp one of the best in every way. We have a good auditorium for public meetings and entertainments, a good school building for psychic classes and seances. We have a fair hotel under the management of the association, and some cottages yet for rent. Board and rooms can be secured at the hotel at reasonable rates; or campers can rent cottages and board themselves.

We extend a cordial invitation to all to come and join in the good work.

Camp opens July 26 and closes Aug. 31. Good music and the usual entertainments will be in order. Spiritual papers sent in care of Maple Dell camp will be honestly distributed, and agents of same will have an opportunity to secure subscribers.

VALUE OF FOODS.

What Constitutes a Proper Test?

In The Progressive Thinker, No. 657, is an editorial giving the report or some Minnesota scientists in regard to the value of the different kinds of bread. It seems to me that their report is misleading, because the experiments were not scientifically made. It is a well-known fact in hygiene that foods, to give best results, must be so selected as to give the proper amount of the different elements necessary to the support of the physical system.

I may not be able to give the different names and amounts, but will designate them as strong foods and weak foods. Where the stomach is given too much of the strong foods and not enough of the weaker ones, it is not able to properly digest and extract the nutriment, and injury to the stomach occurs in the form of indigestion. Where there is too much of the weaker foods and not enough of the strong ones, there is not enough vital elements obtainable, and the person is apt to become weak and vitally run down.

Now in the case of the scientists' experiments, milk, which is a strong and perfect food, was used in all cases, so that in combining it with the whole wheat bread, which is also a strong and perfect food, the stomach was overloaded with the strong foods and had none at all of the weaker ones, so was not able to properly extract the nutriment and did not have a proper variety from which to select. In the case of the fine or white flour, there was a more even division of the strong and weak foods and a better result naturally followed. To my mind a proper test can not be made by isolating one or two things and testing in that manner. Now, if, instead of selecting milk, they had used with the different kinds of bread, a diet of vegetables, they would have obtained an entirely different result and the test would have been more in accordance with actual food supplies in every-day life. We want truth in these matters and truth cannot be arrived at by wrong methods or experiments.

Hoping these few thoughts will suggest others to bring out an intelligent discussion of this subject, I am,

Respectfully,
Portland, Ore. J. C. FERRELL.

A Very Curious Case.

To the Editor:—Will some one kindly enlighten me upon the following case, as I am somewhat at sea? At a seance about a year and a half ago, myself and two friends, one being under control, an Indian came, claiming to be a Sioux, and requested us to change time and meetings from Sunday and Wednesday evenings at 8 o'clock, to Tuesday and Friday evenings at 10 o'clock, as he would be very well pleased to come. Acting upon his suggestion we changed according to his request, with very satisfactiry results. His identity at first meeting (name) was unknown, and he stated at second meeting he would give name, which he did, and claimed it to be Red Cloud. Late press reports give this chief as living, but likely to pass over at any time. During the time, one and a half years, he has never failed to visit us twice a week, giving very truthful messages, and at every time of his control the medium sees his former companion, Sitting Bull (clairvoyantly) but has never been able to see Red Cloud, only by feeling his presence.

During perfect trance condition, the medium has repeatedly chosen Red Cloud's picture from a private collection of a former Indian commissioner's list of 150 chiefs. Red Cloud says the reason that he fails to be seen is that he is still on this side.

Several claim it is an impersonating spirit, but that we cannot believe for we have kept minutes for over a year and find that he has erred only twenty times. Is it the astral body of said chief? During the last seance the question was put, and the reply received was, "Where is the young chief or pale-face when he is asleep?"

WHEN PA GETS SICK.

When Pa gets sick he always knows
He's gonter die, and Tommy goes
For Dr. Quack, an' 'fore he 'rives
I'm hurried off for Dr. Ives,
An' Ma an' Bess an' Auntie, too,
For liniments an' gruels go,
An' plasters an' the warmin' brick
An' everything, when Pa gets sick.

No once of us is 'lowed to play,
The baby's sent across the way,
The 'pothecary's boy's about,
The hull time runnin' in an' out,
The house so with his groans is filled
Folks stop to ask who's gettin' killed,
An' misery is piled on thick
For everyone, when Pa gets sick.

We never have no table set,
Cold vittles is the best we get,
For cook is busy to the brim
Contrivin' dainty things for him,
An' studyin' it in my mind
I'm good deal more'n half inclined
To think—although I dassent kick—
We suffer most when Pa gets sick.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD
A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death.
By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Isaac Perry: Q. (1) Is there a cure for eczema?

(2) Is there any way to prevent poisoning by poison ivy, (Rhus) oak and sumach?

A. (1) There are many forms of this affection of the skin, of greater or less virulence, and all have a strong tendency to be continuous or chronic. The "salt rheum" is an old name for a well-known form, considered by many physicians to be an inherited tendency. There is usually a more or less decided eruption, with watery exudation, or a dry and scaly surface. The disease is accompanied with intense itching, and burning heat, intensified by rubbing the surface affected. Physicians agree in pronouncing the disease among the most difficult to treat successfully, and there are obdurate cases that no treatment at their command more than palliates. Such cases they claim become constitutional, and they prescribe "purifying the blood," by iodides, arsenic, etc. As this is entirely an assumption, those who do not believe that poisons are in any case beneficial, will hesitate to allow such experimentation.

The best authorities consider the disease the result of fungoid growth, and hence local treatment is all that is required. There are many germicides and disinfectants which give good results; among the most useful in a general way is carbolated vaseline, and this is improved by adding common pine tar. The disease is so persistent that the remedy must be continued for some time before a cure can be expected. In connection with its use, the diet should be carefully attended to, as the strengthening of the vital forces, in this, as in all other cases, is a prime factor in warding off attack. It is because of the weakening of vitality that disease germs are enabled to establish themselves at first. The grains and fruit furnish an ideal food and the less flesh the better.

And furthermore, foul air of illy-ventilated living, and especially sleeping apartments, is a most prolific cause. Heavy garments that are close in texture and prevent free access of air to the surface, virtually hold in the exhalations which should freely escape, give the same results. The most painful case of eczema was caused by a mother insisting in wrapping her babe in close flannel clothing and blankets, and grew worse under the doctor's treatment, until a hygienic friend persuaded the mother to throw the wraps away and clothe her child in light and loose-fitting garments. Pure air and sunshine are nature's germicides, and are the most reliable and effective.

Garments should be of the loosest texture and only enough worn to prevent uncomfortable sensation of cold. The same may be said of the covering of beds. The air of the house should be so pure that there will be no feeling of closeness when entering. Rooms not wide open for the entrance of light and air are poisonous. The effects of sleeping or living in such rooms may not at first be apparent, but the feeling of weariness on awakening; restlessness, or inability to sleep; the morning headache, indicate the insidious work of the vitiated atmosphere.

This applies in a general way to all forms of disease, as their potent cause and aggravation. It were more salutary to sleep wrapped in a blanket on a wind-swept hill, than in most sleeping-rooms as at present constructed.

(2) The susceptibility to poisoning by poison ivy, etc., varies with individuals, some being so much so that they will be poisoned passing near it without touching it, while others are not affected, although they rub the leaves over the skin. It may be observed, either because there are changes in the plant, atmosphere or in the individual, if a person is not poisoned at one time, he should not take any chances of being immune at another. There is no known preventative, but a coating of any oily substance on the hands and face would lessen the chances, if one should be compelled to come in contact with these plants.

In case of poisoning, among the best remedies is ordinary soda—the bi-carbonate used in cooking, sprinkle freely over the affected surface and cover with a dampened compress.

H. V. S., Fort Wayne, Ind.: Q. Dr. Peebles asserts that Mrs. Eddy was a Spiritualist and a medium, and that he sat in her circles in Boston, over thirty years ago. Christian Scientists stoutly deny this. Have you any knowledge on the subject?

A. The evidence of Dr. Peebles cannot be invalidated. While I have a distinct memory of Mrs. Eddy being mentioned as a medium in the Spiritual papers, I have no direct personal knowledge on the subject. Her denial of this early experience is in keeping with all her other pretenses, and Spiritualists should allow it quietly to pass, for Christian Science, is not desirable either as an offshoot or an ally.

Daniel McGennis. Q. Is it true that there is a destiny that shapes our ends rough-hew them as we may?

Will every soul receive recompense either in this or future life for wrongs it may perpetrate?

Are there spirit forces that will see that absolute justice is rendered?

A. These questions all spring from the old belief in the arbitrary government of the world by an outside power. There is no controlling force or intelligence that takes up individual instances of injustice, that measures out the recompense for each. There is no overshadowing destiny from which, do as we please, we are compelled to go forward as it dictates. Yet absolute justice comes in the end, and every wrong must be atoned for, and we are under the control of unchanging law.

While there is no spirit or spirits, who pass judgment on human conduct, and attend to its record and punishment, no one can pursue a course contrary to the higher law of his being without suffering the consequences. As a spirit he becomes partially freed from the control of his environment—a creator, a free agent, as a spirit should be led by the highest spiritual motives. If he fail in this and yields to the baser desires of purely animal life, he goes downward instead of upward, and his degradation is his punishment. Should he awaken, by his own efforts or the ministration of philanthropic, superior intelligences, his conscience quickened would sting with its reproach until there had been complete and just recompense.

Scriptures: Q. What passages in the Bible speak of materialization?

A. Genesis 3:8; 18:1; 32:24; Ezekiel 11:9; Daniel 5:5; Luke 24:15, 16, 29, 30, 31; John 20: 19, 30; Luke 20: 30, 31.

THE BLESSED LIFE.

The Blessed Life is a life of love and joy and is its own beatitude. Silence and aloneness are good for the soul.—Rev. Dr. Quayle.

Love lives in all things and animates all,
'Tis only when blinded to this that men fall,
They enter love's kingdom who follow Love's call.

Her companion is Wisdom, and pure, undefiled,
Are the pleasures she seeks, yet gentle and mild
She dwells in the heart of the innocent child.

Then greet the world lovingly, never with scorn,
And know in thy heart when the Christ-love is born,
Ah! then mayst thou enter the gates of the Morn.

Like a pearl-light of life from the infinite sea,
Where the soul finds its summer and hearts are as free
As the perfume of flowers when it sweetens the air,
And floats on the breeze, like a hymn or a prayer,
That lifts from a grief-burdened spirit its care,—
Like a messenger-bird from the radiant shore—
Where Morning has dawned, and "the Night is no more."
Like the light of all beautiful visions combined,
Like the essence distilled from all pleasures refined,
Like our joy in the loveliest things that we find,
Like these was the birth of that song to my mind.
Oh! pearl-light of life from the infinite sea,
Oh! breath of the Summer land wafted to me,
I bless thee that ere in my heart thou wast born,
As I labor and sing by the gates of the Morn.
Ah! high the tuition and holy the art
That waked the deep fountains of peace in my heart,
And taught me this beautiful lesson of life,
"That a power comes with love that can triumph o'er strife,"
And soothe the dark spirits that wander o'er earth,
By wild passions driven, sin-stained from their birth.
Since then with a patience and trust growing strong
Thro' the blessings up-springing from sorrow and wrong
I have toiled with a courage that cheerfully waits,
Oft hearing the angel that sings by Love's gates,
Ever saying to mortals, "Behold ye the law"
In the life that God giveth is never a flaw;
Then shelter and cherish, but never a deem low
One child that his wisdom alone can bestow,
But oh! give it time, give it room here to grow,
In the sunshine of love let it ripen below;
Then its fruits will be blessings, and curses no more
Will sweep o'er the world with their pestilent lore;
Every heart then will plant in Love's garden the seeds
That will show in her harvest increase of good deeds,
And the blessings of life will then equal man's needs.
Then prisons and chains, then the gallows and knife
Will mar not the growth of this wonderful life,
Or wake the dark fountains of hatred and strife,—
But men, taught of angels, will cultivate flowers
To bloom in life's garden, as well as her bowers,
And Love, and Love ever give wings to the hours,—
Then "wars and rumors of wars will cease,"
And the triumphs of Justice and Mercy increase,
Till Earth shall resound with the "Gospel of Peace."

BELLE BUSH.

THEY ARE LOVERS STILL.

His hair as wintry snow is white;
Her trembling steps are slow;
His eyes have lost their merry light,
Her cheeks their rosy glow;
Her hair has lost its tints of gold,
His voice no joyous thrill,
And yet, though feeble, gray and old,
They're faithful lovers still.

Since they were wed, on lawn and lea,
Oft did the daisies blow,
And oft across the trackless sea
Did swallows come and go.
Oft were the forest branches bare
And oft in gold arrayed;
Oft did the lilies scent the air,
The roses bloom and fade.

They've had their share of hopes and fears,
Their share of bliss and bale,
Since first he whispered in her ears
A lover's tender tale.
Full many a thorn amid the flowers
Has lain upon their way;
They've had their dull November hours
As well as days of May.

But firm and true through weal and woe,
Through change of time and scene,
Through winter's gloom, through summer's glow,
Their faith and love have been.
Together hand in hand they pass
Serenely down life's hill,
In hopes one grave in churchyard grass
May hold them lovers still.

HIS LAST SONG.

During the last illness of the actor and manager, Frank L. Yerance (husband of Clair Tuttle Yerance) which terminated in death after a surgical operation at the Presbyterian Hospital, New York, April 19, 1902, his mother made inquiry as to how he had passed the day. "Well!" was the answer; "he sang a song."

Stricken with fatal illness,
Forced to retire at last,
In the hospital's soul-chilliness
He lay and dreamed of the past.
He thought of his high ambitions,
His struggles to reach their goal;
Of triumphs, and sweet fruitions,
Till hope flamed up in his soul.

His black eyes flashed from the pillow
As the old dreams floated by;
Like a song-bird perched on a willow
He rocked 'neath a sullen sky.
Hope's blossoms which glowed to languish,
Bloomed flush as in days of yore;
His thin lips pallid from anguish,
Parted to sing once more!

A song, all a-tremble with feeling,
Arose from the actor's bed,
And on through the ward went pealing,
Baptising each weary head;
A song all a-lilt with action,
Catchy, and full of fire,
Rousing from base distraction,
Floating the soul up higher.

He finished, and whispered saying,
"O mother! O brother! O wife!—
Far off in Ohio praying
Each hour that God spare my life;—
I never"—the surgeons waiting,
Were ready with drug and thong
For the knife test. Not belating
He died, like his last sad song.

THOUGHTFUL REFLECTIONS

Spiritualism Is Religion Itself.

To the Editor:—I have heretofore read with much interest and pleasure the sermons and articles from the pen of Elder F. W. B. Myrick; however, an article of his in No. 657 of your paper, to my mind calls for some per contra statements and a far wider field of comparison than he chooses to give to his subject, "Religion," but his object seems to be a defense of orthodox Christianity. I agree with him essentially that Spiritualism is religion; but not "a religion."

"Pure and undefiled religion" is in substance to do good and be good (James 7-27); all other so-called religions, as per lexicons, consisting of dogmas, rites, sacraments, and ceremonies are forgeries and fakes.

The Rev. gentleman seeks to prove that Spiritualism is "a religion" because in one or two respects the belief of the one is in harmony with the knowledge of the other. He says: "Millions of people believe there is a future life; in that life there is a God, a son of God, a host of the spirits of men and women who have gone over there. They believe at death their spirits will enter into that spirit realm. They also try to live an ideal life. These ideas and beliefs are the elements of every religion known to man. The Spiritualist teaches all these fundamentals, and last but not least a good life here is necessary to fit us for the best over there. Christianity taught this ages before. Christianity says, 'We believe.' Spiritualists say, 'We know.' The absolute demonstration of the truth of Spiritualism has not come to me. I boldly affirm that Spiritualism has not added a single valuable concept to the Christian religion."

Some wise man has said, that "a half told truth is the worst kind of a falsehood." The elder has indeed put a very fine facial expression upon orthodox Christianity, but let us take a more critical view along the lines if indestructible history. First, not one Spiritualist in a thousand believes in an especial son of God, but they know that all men and women are sons and daughters of the eternal, uncreated forces of nature. Christians have not agreed as to the condition of the spirit after death prior to the resurrection of the dead, many holding that all slept until Gabriel sounded his horn. Orthodox Christianity says that a man may live the greatest possible life of crime and debauchery, and at the last moment of earthly life repent and ascend in the arms of angels, to realms of bliss, and millions of them hold that the vilest of the vile can by the payment of a sufficient pile of gold, be removed after death from purgatorial misery to happiness and glory. St. Peter's Church, teh glory of Rome, was chiefly built from the sale of indulgences by the Pope to commit all kinds of sin and crime.

Primitive Christianity no doubt taught the necessity of a pure life, but orthodoxy has not taught this since the third century, neither does it teach it now. Elder Myrick may have a little church of his own, where he teaches a code of ethics of his own, and persuades himself it is orthodox Christianity; but it is not. Facts and history are against him.

Leaders of the Catholic church to-day will not admit that their church has ever done any wrong, or taught in the least any false doctrine. Let us compare a little further. Christianity is founded on miraculism, with a world and all life created in six days, a fallen humanity created perfect by an infinite being, an only begotten son crucified as the only means of saving from eternal torment a very small fraction of the human family; many millions of martyrs have perished at the bidding of the defenders of these nonsensical dogmas; these are the opposite sides of orthodox Christianity which Elder Myrick had not time to write about; when comparing it with Spiritualism, which is religion wedded to nature, and the indestructible truths of science, a house built upon the rock of eternal truth; while Christianity, that is to say, its numberless falsehoods, its silly myths and puerile dogmas are like chaff being blown away, it is a "house built upon the sand," it is only a matter of time for the mighty waters of truth to wash away its mythical foundation and structure; and all that can remain will be its good deeds and lives, then and not before, can there be any just comparison between Christianity and Spiritualism, and all attempts to make it appear otherwise will be abortive. There is a mighty vortex; an unfathomable gulf; between Miraculism and Naturalism, only one of these ideas can live, the other must die. B. F. FRENCH.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM.

It Embraces Whatever Is Worthy In Every System.

NUMBER THIRTEEN.

Liberty!

Spiritualism teaches that the first requisite to living the harmonious life is liberty. "Where the spirit of God is there is liberty" (Paul). No man can do his best in thought or action without freedom, although you may look for some excesses when people accustomed to the yoke and chain assert their rights; just as a colt too long confined, if loosened on rough ground may break a leg kicking up his heels. For decades now we have been taught that freedom of thought is an inalienable right, and sometimes the right of free speech has been asserted. Surely we know that the legitimate result of free thought is free speech, and the inevitable outcome of both is free action. To-day we think, to-morrow we talk, and the third day we act. Exercise of either right is primarily about your personal life, and as a social being it must be generously qualified by social obligations and so far as possible living at peace with all men, adapting one's self to his environment. In Rome to some extent doing as the Romans do, but never abandoning a principle or surrendering the right to work for better things or to leave Rome.

"If I have freedom in my soul,
And in my mind am free,
Angels alone that soar above
Enjoy such liberty."

But this greater liberty always implies greater gentleness and regard for the rights of others. A slave has worked and fought for his own liberty in the hope of one day owning slaves himself. You get no liberty "from above" on any such terms, and as a general principle he only is worthy of liberty who is willing to grant it to others. You find a man devising chains for others—he is forging them really for himself.

NUMBER FOURTEEN.

Wealth.

A Chinaman when approached by a minister said, "Oh, yes, me likee get salvation; 'Melican religion heap profitable." Under ideal commercial institutions no doubt mediums and Spiritualists in general would be comfortable, but especially to sensitives Spiritualism is not generally "heap profitable."

The most familiar passage of scripture to professing Christians who yet bend all their best powers to the continual pursuit of wealth is that the love of money is the root of all evil, and of all literature the New Testament most forcibly denounces the rich man.

"Ye say 'I am rich and increased in goods and have need of nothing,' and knowest not that thou art naked and poor and blind." The possession affects men differently, but a mind engrossed in pursuit of wealth is unfitted for fellowship with angels. No passion is so benumbing and deadly a foe as the absorbing lust for gold. Under ideal economic conditions the possession of considerable wealth would not be proof of talents wasted—of faculties and powers atrophied—of social virtues withered; but in this city of Seattle, where sixty-five men were arrested in one day for the crime of poverty, I could imagine Peter or Paul when asked to plead say: "Your Honor, if I were rich among thousands of needy brethren, then would I plead guilty of crime."

Jesus advised the young man "if thou wouldst be perfect, sell all, etc." This man was ambitious to attain a high spirituality, and to-day as then to attain the highest possible it is necessary that one be free from the disturbing cares that accompany the possession of great wealth, as well as to enlist the aid of heavenly spirits by alleviating the miseries of the incompetent and unfortunate. The prayer of the wise man now and of old is "give me neither poverty nor riches."

Without condemning the hog, Spiritualism teaches that the qualifications of a great and good man vary from those of a good pig or a prize bulldog. Nature, however dealing with swine, having so richly endowed man with emotions and affections requires that they be nourished, and in doing this the strong must support the weak. We are not fish that the big ones should eat the little ones. The greatest pleasure the rich man can know comes from assisting the poor. We are constructed on the principle that it is more blessed to give than to receive. He that giveth to the poor lendeth to the Lord or the angels, and if sensitive to magnetic influences can draw interest before sundown. This is the general principle and it is sound, yet there is an important qualification which I will treat of in "Magnetic Attractions." Anyway, I am only one member of the community, and until there is a better recognition of the principle, or I become more spiritual, I must consider expediency in acting upon this divine principle.

Confucius wrote that under a good government it is a disgrace to be poor, and under a bad government a disgrace to be rich. Not having yet realized the ideal, governments are largely good or bad by comparison. Under codified laws and set customs and unyielding institutions, when the object of your lawmaker is to legislate for the average, providing he be sincere, intelligent and successful in that purpose, the one who is far above and the man who is far below the average must suffer. The front and rear guard are harassed by conditions not adapted to their case, and it is not sufficient proof of any unworth that I am poor, nor of your worth that you are rich. "A man's wealth consists not in the abundance of his possessions."

One whose nose has always been on the grindstone and his eyes in the mud, and who has no dream of things to be, will denounce indiscriminately as anarchists all who catch a gleam of better things. This vision bursting on undisciplined minds may and does occasionally incite to protest by acts of unreasonable violence, but Spiritualism, although it has no uncertain sound, and seeks all adequate means, relies most on the silent and unseen forces that move Helen Gould, Crittenden, Ends, Stanford and Carnegie to acknowledge according to their light the coming of a change and to avoid "dying disgraced" or rich.

"Ring out the narrowing lust for gold."

NUMBER FIFTEEN.

Spiritual Healing.

Healing the physical body is the only "gift" that receives anything like general appreciation by "our friends the enemy." Now it is of no consequence whether called divine healing, mental healing, magnetic healing, suggestive therapeutics or any other name, providing we understand what is meant, nor of any significance whether done under the great sanction of Leo, Eddy, Dewey, Brigham Young or any other spiritual monopolist, except as it may lead the mind into a realm of unreason—the imagination into a chaotic metaphysical bog—the will into a religious prison.

The underlying principle is that a chemical change in nerve, blood, tissue, follows a change in the mental attitude. This is so even in the lower animals, as the saliva of an enraged dog or horse is more poisonous than the same animal when at peace.

The higher the mental development, the more serious the result. I read that by chemical analysis scientists can determine which of two drops of sweat was taken from a man in anger or in peace. Whether or no physicians have always given some credit to the principle, and the most unspiritual of them has been forced to acknowledge that with some patients suffering from serious ailments confidence in the physician's ability is of more consequence than the strength or virtue of the medicine.

But this is not all. The magnetic healer charges the diseased person with a healthy magnetic aura which holds a similar relation to the nerves as blood does to the veins, while stimulating or inciting the imagination to generate a healthy aura; and the great healer brings to his assistance the aid of spirit friends. Cures that are effected of chronic or serious ailments by relying on the patient's imagination alone are temporary, and the more magnetic or especially the more spiritual the healer the less dependence he places on excitement, pomposity or extravagant advertisements which act on the imagination primarily, and the slower and seductive but more sure is his treatment. However the imagination and emotional nature must be acted upon to open the gates for his own and those spirit influences.

When the woman touched Jesus "he felt power go out of him." She drew upon his magnetism. In all social intercourse there is a current which tends to equalize things, and there is not a healthy person but who in his social relation is a magnetic healer, for he charges the weak with his aura. If possessed of hypnotic power (hypnotism is the art of appealing to the imagination) he uses it in rendering the weak person receptive. The cure is made easy if the emotions are pleasurably excited, for the nervous system is thus made responsive, and especially is this desirable when dependence is laid upon the action of spirit agencies.

To my certain knowledge in some cases, and I presume it is so in all great cures, spirit friends perform manipulations (as massage) and administer medicine which is as real if not so course as Perry Davis' Pain Killer itself. Spirits frequently direct the compounding of new medicines.

Spiritualism acknowledges regular laws of chemical action, and has no quarrel with the intelligent chemist, only requiring him to play second fiddle when dealing with a person responsive to the "finer forces." Nor, as Buchanan says, "can a rigid line be drawn between medicine and food, inasmuch as the same elements constitute both, only being in varying proportions or combinations in various preparations. So long therefore as you find it necessary to use physical food, so long may you find it beneficial to occasionally use what you may term medicine.

Some Cogent Reflections on Spiritualism.

I have been striving to learn the truths of Spiritualism for the last fifty years, and each day of my life I find something new and grand, and I for one do not want the wheels of progress blocked in any manner so that I may not have perfect freedom to change my views of yesterday or accept a new truth wherever and whenever found, be it from elevated or lowly ground. We all know what a deep rut that conglomerated mixture of truths and falsehoods, that pretended God-given book called the Bible, has made for all of its followers seeking religion. Just so sure as we accept any of its phrases as standards for us as Spiritualists, just so sure are we nearing that fatal rut into which they wish to draw us, and into which if we permit ourselves to be drawn, will prove our grave. Our boasted angelic Spiritualism will be swallowed up but not in victory, and will go just where ancient Spiritualism is to-day.

The priests and ministers well know the falsity of their position, and are gradually clipping from their creeds as fast as they dare the objectionable points, and accepting ours instead, and all they want is to have us do likewise, and adopt some of theirs, so that either we or they cannot recognize the original. They seem to be putting forth every exertion to bring us nearer to them, even while they are crying fraud and the works of the Devil, and when they get us just where they want us they will turn right in with all their thunder and declare as did the coward assisting to catch the wild bull (but all the time out of danger), "we have got him at last!" Our beautiful angel-given Spiritualism will then be where the bull is, in the hands of the butchers to be mangled out of all recognition; in other words in that old religious rut where priestcraft slavery has placed us, and we go back into that old conglomerated mixture of biblical oblivion, where they have been for thousands of years. Shall we do it? I for one answer, and I think with the angels of heaven on my side, No! In the language of a very distinguished statesman, I know not what course others may take, but as for me, give me liberty or give me the other side of life.

We ask the privilege in the progress of our minds or thoughts to cast aside our yesterday's views, if they do not correspond with the truth, and accept those of to-day.

The orthodox are and always have been carrying too much dead weight. If they would cast out of that book its lies and worse than useless ancient history of murder and rapine, and base their creeds on what would be left (if there was any residue), they might induce us to fall into line, but no! the priest would lose his calling and likewise his bread and butter, and the poor fellow would have to work for a living.

That which we call science is not always the truth. Truth, a living certainty and downright fact is what we want, and we do not want a straw laid in our way of accepting it at any and all times.

It is the true message and meaning of Spiritualism. Put up no standards to-day that we may not kick down to-morrow if we find they do not correspond to the truth. They would, as stated above, be too much dead weight. These fixed standards that cannot be removed are the main stumbling blocks to progress. Clear the track and keep it clear, and progression is sure.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

By A. LEAH UNDERHILL,
(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. Do not fail to send for a copy at once. J. R. FRANCIS,

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 437 pages, cloth bound. Price $2.00.

WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Read His Valuable Book, "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You this Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored had traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing, and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

HAVE SELF CONTROL.

Its Importance from Every Standpoint.

How strange it is that people who are apparently perfectly rational as far as outward appearances go—hold dormant and unseen impulses which, if allowed free rein, would soon result in the most shocking crimes imaginable. It has been said that the mad-houses do not contain all the lunatics, and the assertion is right and true. Day by day, we see blazoned in the newspapers, with "flaring scare-heads," the disgusting accounts of revolting crimes of every description. Many, if not the majority of these crimes are committed as a result of the high-strung nervous organization of some person, losing its balance, and becoming, in its unsettled state, a prey to the devilish impulses which emerge, dragon-like, from the deep caverns of the subconscious life. It makes no difference if the impulse proceeds from low astral beings, or from the subconscious life of the criminal; what we wish to know is, how to avoid these crimes. If people would not be led by their passions, but would try to exercise self-control in all things, we would not read of so many cases of suicides and murders as we do at the present time, and the space in the newspapers which is now so occupied could be given over to more interesting and entertaining reading, such as short studies in literature, selections from the poets, or something of a like nature.

There are far more doctors of the body than doctors of the mind at the present time. We need more doctors of the mind; men who understand the strange workings of the mental machinery, and who may suppress by hypnotic suggestion and other means the insane impulses of the degenerate mind.

Under the stress of conditions imposed by the hustle and rush of the present state of American life many weak minds succumb to evil influences and degraded thoughts. If there was ever a time when a person needed wise self-control, that time is to-day. If a person has an evil impulse, he should quell it at once, for if he allow it to exist, it will gain in power, and sometime turn and rend its owner.

There are many people who naturally possess a passive mind; that is, they are passive and receptive, and more or less susceptible to all sorts of influences. Such people should seek in every way to strengthen their will, and always be their own master in word and deed. They should stand by their own powers, and lean not on the counsels of others.

It is perfectly true that many people are driven to commit crimes or to take their own life by reading the sensational newspaper accounts of murders and suicides. Any person who has a knowledge of the principles of hypnotism and psychology, knows the dangerous effects of reading thrilling "murder stories," and of looking at the disagreeable pictures of patent medicine advertisements, which show the terrible effect of dyspepsia on a person who failed to take Dr. Blank's Royal Diamond Remedy. The venders of patent medicine try by every way possible to catch the attention of the reader. A good many times we read an interesting article part way through, to find that it breaks off abruptly, and begins to tell of the wonderful healing powers of Dr. Whatisit's Green Drops for Sallow People. Well might the reader who gets tricked into reading a patent medicine advertisement say: "You cram these words into mine ears against the stomach of my sense."

A strange case of insane impulse, leading to criminal actions, is that of the poisoner Jane Toppan. A recent editorial in the Boston Post says:

"She apparently poisoned for no motive of gain or personal advantage. The small sums of money said to have disappeared on several occasions do not deserve to be considered. As Miss Toppan is reported to have declared to the examining physicians, she 'was unable to restrain herself.' Her impulses, her moral sense, her will, were perverted. In an earlier age of the world she would be said to be possessed of a devil.' The psychological interpretation of her case to-day is that she is insane, a degenerate."

This case as an illustration, will show the result of allowing the mind to become dominated by bad impulses. Guard carefully thy thoughts, and root out the evil and unworthy. Thus will you become perfect.

SUSPICION.

Deception and Its Consequences.

It is a curious fact that the suspicious, who so often fear or fail to accept a truth—even denying it simply because it does not touch them—should be taken in so much oftener by an untruth, or be deceived despite their supposed caution.

Why this is so, can only be inferred on the theory that their intuitive perception is still darkened to the light, and therefore it does not touch them readily enough to be felt; thus the suspicion that it must be untrue.

However it may furnish a cue to the reason why some people are unable to grasp the spiritual in life's unfoldments. Their vibrations or soul-forces do not rise beyond a certain range, and only that which lies within their scope is truth for them.

But we find a similar skepticism existing among the cultured or intelligent, who are more readily touched by deception or an untruth than they are by the truth. Shall we attribute this to a like low vibration?

It is undoubtedly true that a man may be intellectually bright, yet spiritually dull, but that does not account for those who can accept a spiritual fact, yet be ever suspicious of deception or wrong. There are such in every stratum of human developments, Spiritualism not excepted.

It suggests the possibility of skepticism being an hereditary evil, or one acquired in the course of events by some form of self-love, which attributes to itself superior understanding that takes the form of a living principle in the human make-up or spirit, and then acts nolens volens, uninvited.

It may be regarded as a misfortune or a just punishment for imposition when under the spell of this belief of superiority—and perhaps wilful deception.

Does a merchant ever decry his wares? Is not success in business largely based on deception? Are not political issues a means of deceiving the public? Is not society largely impregnated with sham? Does not our intelligent will create the principles of our being?

Effects are compatible with their causes; and the man who deceives others, will end in deceiving himself. Thus his blindness to the truth; and the higher truths of Spiritualism, even after he has been convinced of spirit communion through the phenomena. Deception will be his from the beyond in the same ratio that he has been deceiving mortals or vibrates in harmony with untruth or pretension. Skepticism will naturally follow with suspicion in its wake for everything that is true or righteous. And he will be selfishly deceived or led into misfortune in comparison to his past doings in this respect.

The laws or principles of our being avenge or reward themselves on us consistent with their creation. Man is his own arbiter—the maker of his own misery or happiness. The undoing of a discord demands the "uttermost farthing" for restoration to harmony with natural law. Virtue is its own reward. Love pays interest in the form of contentment of mind. Sacrifice inherits happiness and peace.

To be free from suspicion, then, must we be credulous?

By no means. We must be able to feel what is and what is not true, simply. It requires no particular sensitiveness to inherit this gift. Intuition is a soul-qualification that all can develop by strict adherence to truth, honesty of purpose, charity for everybody, forgiveness of spirit, righteousness and good will to mankind—suppressing jealousy, ill-feeling, resentment and other emotions not spiritual.

In that condition the soul becomes a mirror for the reflection of truth, which is always a consolation, whatever the attending circumstances. Neither suspicion nor skepticism troubles him who holds himself above suspicion, or in harmony with the sphere of truth.

ANTI-HISTORICAL CRUSADE

Catholics Pitching into Appleton's Cyclopedia.

The attack upon Appleton's Encyclopaedia is directed against Charles Kendall Adams, president of the University of Wisconsin; Rossiter Johnson, Prof. George P. Fisher, Rev. Samuel M. Jackson, Prof. A. R. Marsh, Prof. John W. Burgess, Prof. McGiffert and others. Some of the sentences objected to are as follows:

"In England the revival of learning prepared the ground for ecclesiastical change. The friends of the new learning had a spirited contest with the devotees of scholasticism. More, Colet and Erasmus, during his stay in England, exerted themselves in behalf of letters and against superstition. * * The first (source of the Reformation) was the moral and religious feeling which was enlisted in favor of the Protestant movement."

"Superstitious subjection to a sacerdotal order in regard to things unseen, unknown, and represented as eternal; * * the direct immorality and disobedience to law and order, coupled with the most exaggerated and enthusiastic religiosity; * * fancy and imagination without reflection; faith without reason; devotion without humanity—these are some of the contradictions which characterize the medieval spirit. Those great cathedral piles testify not only to the power of the imagination and devotion of the age, but also to the undervaluation of the human sufferings and sacrifices by which they were founded and builded."

"The sum and substance of all authority and grace were conceived as proceeding from Christ to the chief of his apostles, to whom the Pope was successor; by the latter dealt out again upon the bishops in their consecration, and then by these in turn upon the priests and laity. The power to bind and to loose, to damn and to save, became thus, according to this conception the property of a close corporation, which by the power of excommunication from the company of the saved upon earth, with all its attendant consequences upon the social and political status of the individual, and of the threats of eternal punishment hereafter, held the souls of men in a state of spiritual subjection of a most degrading nature. The practical result of such a system was spiritual despotism in the church."

"Being granted by the Pope the privilege of selling indulgences in his diocese, employed the Archbishop Tetzel in that service, and the shameless manner in which the latter conducted it called forth Luther's famous ninety-five theses." * * "The Dominican Tetzel, acting as the agent of Archbishop Albert, of Mayence and Magdeburg, had been pushing the sale of indulgences at Juterbok. * * Among those who confessed to him Luther found persons who had bought indulgences." "The scandalous and open sale of indulgences." * * "The sale of indulgences, which in the hands of Tetzel and others was a source of flagrant abuses." "Seller of indulgences. * * "In 1502 he was appointed to preach an indulgence in Zwickau and its vicinity, and he was so successful—that is, he made so much money for the papal treasury—that he was steadily employed in the sale of indulgences for fifteen years. * * It is said that he sold indulgences without requiring previous confession, and that he led an immoral life. * * Roman Catholic writers deny that he sold indulgences without repentance for sins not yet committed; but their argument rests solely on the words of the papal commission, which are vague, and prove nothing with respect to the practice of the man as it had been reported by eye-witnesses.

NATURE'S CHARMS.

I love the birds and blossoms,
And the little laughing rills,
The grandeur of the forest,
With awe, my being thrills—
The leafy dome where songsters,
Pour forth their happy lays,
In strains of fullest freedom,
Of love and joy and praise.

The mountain heights seem holy,
The valleys most serene,
The groves, God's truest temples,
Adorned with living green—
The simple wild-wood flowers,
Most beautiful and sweet,
With bright and blooming bowers,
Fit place for angel feet!

I love to roam in silence,
Unseen and quite alone,
Through fragrant field and forest,
And feel them all my own—
With not a thought of duty,
Of turmoil or of fear,
But more of love and beauty,
Which tends to heaven here.

I love the haunts of nature,
Her works are fair to see,
No matter what the season,
Or the location be;
Her varied views are charming—
Are always fresh and new,
And best of all, her freedom,
Which makes for life that's true.

Give me the glorious sunshine,
The wholesome outdoor air,
The pure and sparkling waters,
And balmy breezes rare,
With just a few companions,
Of true congenial mind,
And I can be contented,
And real enjoyment find—

Can feast my longing spirit,
On truth and love and peace,
And gladly have my wanderings,
Forevermore to cease—
And feel that I am anchored
In silent joyous rest,
With nature's charming visage,—
The beauty I love best. J. H. J.

CANADA TO THE FRONT.

G. Dawson, of Montreal, Defending Spiritualism.

To the Editor:—The letter of Rev. C. Wilfrid Balfour, which appeared in the Montreal Daily Star, is one of the most remarkable communications that I have ever seen on the subject of Spiritualism. Mr. Balfour treats the subject from a High Church Christian standpoint, and endeavors to prove that true Spiritualism is to be found only within the pale of the Christian Church. This is what renders his article almost unique in the history of this interesting subject. While his letter contains much with which I heartily agree, yet there are several statements made to which I take exception, and on which I wish to offer some friendly criticism.

Mr. Balfour is quite right when he says: "Taking Spiritualism to be that system of professed communication with the unseen world we must for its history go further back than fifty-four years. We must go back to the earliest records of man;" but he is not correct when he adds, "which earliest records are undoubtedly found in the Bible." It is now well known to all advanced students of history that the Old Testament is "merely a fragment of an ancient Oriental literature, other fragments of which are being exhumed from the mounds of Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia." If Mr. B. doubts this statement let him read "The Higher Criticism and the Monuments," written by Rev. Prof. A. H. Layce, of Oxford, and published by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. On page 106 of this important work he will find the following statement: "We now know that not only Babylonian beliefs, but the literature in which these beliefs were enshrined, had been brought to Palestine before the age of Moses." Much more might be quoted to prove the existence of earlier records than those of the Bible, but the above must suffice.

Mr. Balfour draws a distinction between what he calls true Spiritualism and false or "divorced Spiritualism," but it is a distinction for which he does not show a corresponding difference. True Spiritualism I would define as genuine communication between men in the flesh and spiritual beings—between the seen and the unseen. The term false Spiritualism might perhaps be appropriately applied to real spirit communications which could be proved to be false and misleading. It goes without saying, however, that fraudulent so-called spiritual manifestations produced by charlatans or tricksters are not Spiritualism at all, but merely an imitation, and, therefore, need not be further noticed in this connection. True Spiritualism, as I understand the term, is as old as humanity. It existed thousands of years before the time Adam is said to have lived. It antedates all churches and all the religious systems of the world of which we have any historical knowledge. In fact, it can easily be shown that all the great religions of the world have had their rise and inception in some form of Spiritualism. Brahminism, Buddhism, Hinduism, Judaism, Christianism, Paganism, Mahometanism, etc., have all had their spiritual manifestations, and thus far are all akin to each other, whether their devotees know it, or whether they are willing to acknowledge it or not.

That Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, Moses and the prophets all received communications from the unseen world no well-informed modern Spiritualist will attempt to deny. Many of these ancient worthies were psychics or mediums, and received their communications direct from the spirit realms, but others of them were not so endowed, and consequently were obliged to consult seers and prophets when they desired to communicate with the unseen intelligences. King David belonged to the latter class; he was not a medium, and so we find that the spirit Jahveh, when he desired to communicate with David, did not do so direct, but sent the prophet Nathan to tell the king how much he was displeased with his conduct in the matter of Uriah. The seers and prophets of those days were what are now known as psychics or mediums.

Mr. Balfour speaks of "Spiritual sights and sounds and messages of divine import coming 'to pure-minded souls' in the church without the aid of mediums or seances," but if he were a little better versed in the philosophy of Spiritualism he would know that these pure-minded souls are themselves mediums, and that when they sit alone in the privacy of their own chambers "seeing visions and hearing voices," as he says they do, they are really holding seances of a very high order. There is no specific number of persons required for a seance; in some cases one is better than two or any other number. I would, however, have Mr. Balfour know that such experiences as he refers to are not confined to persons in his church or any other church. Pure-minded souls of any creed or no creed at all may have such experiences, provided they are sufficiently mediumistic, or psychically developed; and that they place themselves in the proper attitude to permit of the approach of the denizens of the spirit world.

I agree with Mr. Balfour that a great impulse was given to Spiritualism by that prince of psychics, Jesus of Nazareth, the great mediator (or medium) between man and the higher powers of the invisible world. I do not, however, believe that the Christian Church has ever acquired any monopoly of spiritual gifts, or that the truths of Spiritualism can be corralled by any church, or become the exclusive property of any sect, party, or organization in the world—not even by the "National Spiritualist Association of the United States and Canada." No valid objection can be raised to the churches absorbing and adopting as much Spiritualism as they properly assimilate; they are welcome to use the light which modern Spiritualism is shedding upon the earth, but they must not "put it under a bushel." Too long has the church acted on the "dog in the manger" policy in regard to this matter. She would neither use the spiritual gifts which Christ had bequeathed to her, nor allow anybody else to use them if she could help it. But, Spiritualism, as it has come to the world in these latter days—and it has come to stay—is God's gift to the whole human family, without distinction of race, color, class, or creed, and cannot be confined within the limits of any society or organization which is not large enough to embrace the whole human race.

I cannot see any connection between Spiritualism and the sacramentarianism which Mr. B. touches upon in his letter. The two have nothing in common. Spiritualism claims to rest upon a natural scientific basis. Its phenomena have been tested by some of the cleverest scientists of the day—such men as Profs. Hare, Wallace, Crookes, Zollner, Hyslop, James, and a host of others—and proved to be real demonstrable facts in nature. On the other hand, the claims advanced regarding the sacraments are by their very nature incapable of demonstration, and can never be either proved or disproved by any means or methods known to modern science.

Mr. Balfour refers to the difficulty which sometimes arises in establishing the identity of communicating spirits, but he fails to show that people in the church are, in this respect, any better off than those outside its pale.

As to the high ethical teaching of modern Spiritualism, Mr. Balfour thinks it cannot excel the teaching which Christ "gave and still continues to give to mankind." Does Mr. Balfour think that the teaching given in the pulpits of the various churches to-day excel those of Christ. If not, then they are just in the same box, so to speak, as the high ethical teaching of modern Spiritualism; and if one should be discontinued for the reason mentioned, so should the other. Until Mr. Balfour has read "Spirit Teachings," by M. A. Oxon, and other works of a similar character, I claim that he is not in a position to pass an intelligent judgment on this question.

Mr. Balfour says: "In the days of St. Paul those interfering with spirits without resorting to Christ got severely punished and rebuked." Paul and his associates were no doubt possessed of great psychic power. This power continued in the church for some time, but was finally lost by her, and if it now exists anywhere on this earth it is outside the church. If Mr. B. thinks differently let him point out the men in the church of to-day who can exorcise spirits and punish and rebuke their opponents as St. Paul is alleged to have done. Yours truly, G. DAWSON.

ECHOES FROM SPIRIT-LAND.

One by one, from out the shadows
Glide the forms of long ago,
And my pulses thrill with rapture
As they gently come and go.
Close, come closer, gently whisper;
Let me feel your dewy breath!
Let me know by these sweet tokens,
Love survives the touch of death.

Will the vail be rent asunder
That now hides our loved from view?
Will our lives be pure and perfect,
And our gladness ever new?
Gently on my raptured senses
Breathes the answer, "Ever new"—
Soft the echo sighs responsive
"Joy and gladness ever new."

Tell me, oh, my sainted mother,
As you fold me to your breast,
Is there, in your home immortal,
For earth's weary pilgrim, rest?
Softly falls the soothing answer
On my heart, with relief oppressed,
"In the spirit's deathless mansion
There is gladness, peace and rest."

Rev. Joseph A. Sternhart, the preacher who prepared his grave and predicted the time of his death, died July 15, at Milwaukee, Wis. The grave which he made ready is larger than that usually prepared and lined with brick. It is covered by a huge slab of stone bearing the usual inscription.

Will C. Hodge, one of our best speakers, has returned to California. He can be addressed in care of the New York House, San Diego, Cal.

Sophistries of Hudson

His Much Paraded "Hypothesis" Is Completely Demolished by Florence Huntley, the Author of "The Harmonics of Evolution."

In a recent issue of the Record-Herald, Thomson Jay Hudson, Ph. D., LL. D. (author of "The Law of Psychic Phenomena"), has written at some length on the general subject of "Spiritism."

His evident purpose is to show by the process of inductive reasoning that the phenomena (commonly known and designated as "mediumistic" or "spiritualistic"), do not constitute valid evidence that spirits of the dead communicate with the living through mediums.

Those who are already familiar with his writings will quickly observe that he bases his entire argument upon the hypothesis set forth in his work entitled "The Law of Psychic Phenomena."

This being true, it will be seen at a glance that the value of his conclusions concerning the meaning of mediumistic phenomena depends entirely upon the validity of his original hypothesis. If it should come to be known as a fact that his "working hypothesis" is so illogical and self-contradictory as to destroy wholly its scientific value, then it follows with axiomatic certainty that all his arguments based thereon fall to the ground and become utterly valueless.

Can it be possible that Mr. Hudson has made so fatal a blunder in a work of such pretensions? Let us see.

SUMMARY OF HYPOTHESIS.

Mr. Hudson's "working hypothesis," stated by himself in his work above referred to, is as follows—namely:

1. "Man has two minds—for convenience I shall designate the one as the objective mind and the other as the subjective mind." (p. 26.)

2. "The objective mind is merely the function of the physical brain, while the subjective mind is a distinct entity, possessing independent powers and functions, having a mental organization of its own, and being capable of sustaining an existence independently of the body. In other words, it is the soul." (p. 30.)

3. "The objective mind is capable of reasoning by all methods—inductive and deductive, analytic and synthetic." (p. 32.)

4. "The subjective mind is incapable of inductive reasoning." (p. 26.)

5. "The objective mind is not controllable, against reason, positive knowledge or the evidence of his senses, by the suggestion of another." (p. 30.)

6. "The subjective mind is constantly amenable to control by suggestion." (p. 26.)

7. "The subjective mind of an individual is as amenable to the control of his own objective mind as to the objective mind of another." (p. 31.)

8. "The subjective mind exercises complete control over the functions and sensations of the body." (p. 199.)

OVERTHROWS FOUNDATION.

As the foregoing hypothesis constitutes the substantial basis of all Mr. Hudson's arguments against the value of mediumistic evidence, it is of the most vital importance to all his conclusions upon that subject. Not only this, if it shall be shown that this hypothesis upon which he postulates his "Law of Psychic Phenomena" is illogical, irrational, self-contradictory and unscientific, then all that splendid argumentative development is without foundation, and his "law" is no law at all.

An examination of his working formula, or hypothesis, presents, among others, the following curious and most interesting results, viz.:

1. (a) The objective mind is a function of the body. That is, it is a function of the brain. (See proposition 2 of hypothesis.)

(b) The subjective mind exercises complete control over the functions of the body. It therefore controls the objective mind. (See proposition 8 of hypothesis.)

(c) The subjective mind is constantly amenable to control by suggestion of the objective mind. The objective mind therefore controls the subjective mind. (See proposition 7 of hypothesis.)

That is to say, the subjective mind exercises complete control over the objective mind (which is only a function of the body), and at the same time is constantly amenable to control by suggestions of the objective mind.

In other words, the subjective mind controls a function of the body and is controlled by that function at the same time.

Reduced to its simplest expression, this means that the subjective mind constantly controls the objective mind, and is itself at the same time constantly controlled by the objective mind.

And so, according to Mr. Hudson's logic, the subjective mind controls the objective mind, and the objective mind controls the subjective mind. And there you are. It is now in order to inquire which mind is in control. This would strongly suggest that Mr. Hudson's hypothesis upon which he based "The Law of Psychic Phenomena" is in grave need of repairs.

2. If the objective mind controls the subjective mind, and is in turn controlled by the subjective mind, then it follows that the objective mind controls itself by controlling the subjective mind which controls it.

3. Also, if the subjective mind controls the objective mind and the objective mind in turn controls the subjective mind, then it follows that the subjective mind controls itself by controlling the objective mind which controls it.

4. This only means that the objective mind controls itself, and the subjective mind controls itself.

SOME TERSE QUESTIONS.

This last proposition seems perfectly reasonable. But if it be true that each of these two minds controls itself, how is it possible for each to be controlled by the other?

On the other hand, if each is controlled by the other, how is it possible for it to control itself?

It is easy to understand how a snake might swallow a frog if the snake were large enough and the frog were small enough. It is also possible to understand that a very large frog might swallow a very small snake. But human reason pauses at the proposition that a snake and a frog may swallow each other at the same time. It is just possible that a "working hypothesis" might be constructed which would compel them to do so, but if so, such a hypothesis would, in science, be thereby proved false.

It must therefore be clear that Mr. Hudson's working hypothesis, which delegates to each of the two minds complete control over the other, is false. It is therefore unscientific. It is therefore without value.

It follows that all his arguments concerning the subject of mediumship, based upon this "working hypothesis," are sophistries, pure and simple. It follows with equal certainty, that his entire work entitled "The Law of Psychic Phenomena" is without foundation or scientific value.

But this is only the beginning. There are many other equally absurd and illogical results which follow from the sophistries involved in his original "working hypothesis" which cannot be covered in this article.

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

Brief Notes on Various Matters of Interest.

The great day of leisure, noise and dissipation has appeared and disappeared. The gentle pistol, the fussy, fuming, gaudy fire-cracker, so typical of its inventor, the "Heathen Chinee;" the dynamite bomb, and other deadly and semi-deadly missiles have finished for this season their fatal work. The remains of their users are scattered over their track. Once more quiet reigns and the casualties are being remedied as best they may. Let us have peace! until another Glorious Fourth.

One of the landmarks of historic fame of this city is losing, by the simple process of rebuilding, the outlines by which it was known over a generation ago. As the headquarters of the Vigilantes of 1856, it recalls some of the circumstances of that period, and their influence upon the affairs of to-day.

More than any other part of the Union, this State is located in and dominated over by the influence of the Great Empire of Chance. From the first shout that went up, on the discovery of the golden sands at Sutter's mills, down to the present day the residents have been devotees at Fortune's shrine. A beggar to-day might be a crowned prince of wealth to-morrow, as the miner's luck threw the lustre of its star upon him. Probabilities and possibilities were all merged into the sudden action of the incalculable. What wonder that men became reckless and regardless of the old maxims of painstaking prudence. The business of San Francisco for years was gambling. All her buildings and populace rested on that basis.

While this was true, it is also true that the trait has so far run through the Californian thought and life as to make it easier to settle a disputed point by a bet, than in any other way. But the salvation of the State was, that her population has always had a balance of power, in its native American sense of justice and right. When the gambling fraternity undertook to ride rough-shod over the amenities of law and order, the people, as the source of all orderly power, made themselves felt.

The Vigilance Committee of 10,000 members represented the State with its sovereign power. It usurped nothing. It claimed only its own. It acted only as it was possible to act in an American city, under a republican form of government. Constituted authority failed to act, through inability or cowardice. The source of all power, of all potency in the physical is in orderly mob-rule. Hon. Thomas B. Reed, in his address, this year, to the students and alumni of Bowdoin College said: "We are governed in all important things, not by individual intelligence but by the sense of the community, the sentiment of the masses, the spirit of the crowd—the mob."

The Vigilance Committee, on May 17, 1856, moved its headquarters from the Turn Verein Hall on Bush street, between Powell and Stockton streets, to the two-story brick building now being rebuilt. In these rooms the organization of the committee was carried on to a finish. On the following day, Cora and Casey, the slayers of Richardson and King, were surrendered by the officials having them in charge. The trials were held here. On the 22nd of May the condemned murderers were hung from the windows of the building. Thousands of armed Vigilantes held back twenty thousand people who thronged to see the final act of law's justice.

A little later the building was fortified with gunnybags filled with sand, against possible attack. This brought it the name of "Fort Gunnybags." It was not until the city was freeds from its illicit population completely that the building ceased to be the center of a fearful and wholesome interest. The then level of the street is now four feet below the present doorsills.

The lesson then so thoroughly given has not needed a repetition, although it is something of a question in the minds of the close observers of to-day, whether Law or Gold is the Supreme Justice of the state. But in the days to come, there will be no doubt the Great Heart of the people is in the right place.

It is a question worthy of all consideration how the Presbyterian church, after teaching for two hundred years the doctrine of infant damnation, can possibly survive its repudiation. But step by step the truths and teachings of Spiritualism are taken up as denominational tenets. We are most deeply impressed by "Tom Reed's" latest terse apothegm: "When we declaim that the eternal years of God belong to truth, and see in ecstatic vision the triumph of the future, we seldom have it in our thoughts that the reason why truth is given the eternal years of God is that she needs every one of them," to accomplish the work she was manifested to do. Of all these, none is more important and pressing than the knowledge that man is spirit and not matter.

We understand Doctor Carey, the foremost exponent of the science of "Biochemistry," is to be located in St. Louis, during the World's Fair.

A LATER LETTER.

Our backward wave of temperature is becoming more and more equalized as the July sun marches triumphantly through the heavens. Its direct rays are becoming quite unbearable, and the general average temperature takes away any faint longing for a fire. But with all the varying conditions of our surroundings, pleasure-seekers in the open air may go forward with their plans, assured that no rainy morning will greet them on a fixed date for a day's pleasure. No sudden shower will happen along just as the toothsome picnic lunch has been spread for the appetite-in-waiting, and sprinkle it after the good old Presbyterian fashion.

More than in Chicago, even, does our population, cribbed, cabined and confined during the six days of the week, in palace or cottage, seek, on the seventh day, the balmy airs and restful conditions of our wide expanse of playgrounds for the whole people.

The escaped convict Tracy, who is holding the whole state of Oregon at bay, is the topic of the press. It really is a curious psychological study, and demonstrates the spirit power of the man Tracy, over those who are hunting him. He is certainly in alliance with the "unexpected." It would not be strange if he should escape, as the least-expected solution of the matter.

Our local matters can be grouped in a single item, "politics." The details, at the present day, are ever the same, and the sum total of it all is—jobbery.

There is a considerable discussion, in a quiet way, of socialism, in its various phases, but the sternest drawback is self-denial. This quality is all right, as long as the other fellow manifests it, but when the one has it to do, then the horse is not of so enchanting a color. Undoubtedly, there is a growing tendency toward the equalizing of the burdens of living. This has come down to us from the days of Dennis Kearney and his sand-lot lyceum. Like other mortal things, wonderful changes have come over this ancient soil, on which stood the financially lame, halt and blind, while Dennis in their behalf cursed both the millionaires by accident and the monopolists by selfish desire. The whole area once thus used, is covered now with some of the handsomest business blocks in the town. Dennis is a memory and money is still on the throne.

From force of habit, our people, during the summer, leave the city, seeking rest and change from the treadmills of life. It cannot be they are seeking a better or more agreeable climate. San Francisco is unequaled as an enjoyable city for dilletantism of all sorts. No city on the continent is more nearly related to the old world cities, in this regard, than this. It is a tourist's ideal, and will become more so as its attractions are better known.

Our great Golden Gate from the blue Pacific was not planned by the Eternal Architect for any trivial purpose. Your readers remember the loss of the ill-fated Rio Janeiro. A body, supposed to be that of its captain, has been flung upon the beach, by the restless waves. No means of recognition, however, have offered themselves, save the gold watch found upon the remains. But even this does not locate the present resting-place of the wreck.

The various meetings of the Spiritualists in the city are very little influenced by summer dullness, and are all moving on under the guidance of those who but seldom put off the harness, whether the work is heavy or light. That seems to be a characteristic of the whole Spiritualistic work. If we could only feel more strongly our complete oneness, each for all, how potent and irresistible we might be. Those who are best posted, both seen and unseen, predict that the hours of trial and persecution are approaching nearer and nearer. Is it not well, "in time of peace to prepare for war," and become skilled in the manual of offense and defense, before an enemy begins to batter down our gates.

We talk learnedly of Self. At the same time we forget there are two of us, that Janus face, one of which sees always the heavenly city and its dwellers. The other, looking down, hears and sees only the discords and tumult of the earth and feels but the jar of its constant adjustment. Do we take into consideration how our own interfering will is at fault for a large part of all this friction? As we can see but a part of the field at a time, not being gifted with omniscience, we try to content ourselves on the gridiron. Of all this we are quite certain, for the rest, it is to us the sealed book, of which no man can break the seals thereof. It is true, if it were not for the high relationship of the spirit, our conditions as earth-dwellers would be insupportable.

I must say I should feel a good deal lost, were it not for the weekly visits of The Progressive Thinker. I always look first at the "General Survey," to see what has happened to everybody, and I feel acquainted with them all, if I have not yet met them, I shall be sure to have that pleasure before many years, in the sorrowless land. Then I look to the editorial page, to see what the Chief Justice has handed down from his point of view. Then I look over the rest as it may happen. And I don't forget the advertisements. I made a hundred dollars once by reading an advertisement.

Equal Guardianship of Children.

A bill has been introduced in the Massachusetts legislature to make fathers and mothers joint guardians of their children. In Massachusetts the advocates of equal suffrage have been asking for this just measure for fifty-five years. Last year attention was strongly called to the need of it by the case of Mrs. Naramore, a tender-hearted and hard-working young mother who killed her six children in a fit of distraction caused by her shiftless husband's determination to separate them from her. The question has been taken up by the women's clubs, and strong influence will be brought to bear on the legislature to secure equal guardianship. The only society of women to range itself definitely on the wrong side of this question, so far as known, is the Massachusetts Association Opposed to the Further Extension of Suffrage to Women." It has published over its official imprint a leaflet in defence of the present law, which excludes the mother from all voice in regard to the control and disposal of her children, so long as she lives with her husband.—Alice Stone Blackwell.

CAN THE BARNYARD FOWL BE AN EAGLE, IF HE DONS THE EAGLE'S FEATHERS?

SYNOPSIS OF LECTURE DELIVERED BY MRS. FLORENCE E. B. SHAFFER, OF HOUSTON, TEXAS, SPEAKER FOR THE INDEPENDENT LIBERAL SPIRITUALIST ASSOCIATION.

Our subject to-day, "Can the Barnyard Fowl Be an Eagle if He Dons the Eagle's Feathers" might, at first glance, be considered somewhat of the earth, earthy; and moreover, slightly undignified, if compared to those usually selected through which to expound a doctrine that should at least be considered soul-saving. The practical, every-day ism, however, that which furnishes our mentality with such pabulum as enables us to meet life's conflicts and win, need scarcely be apologized for, to say the least; rather should we seek and find out those truths, however humbly clothed, as will incorporate within our vitality both spiritual and physical strength and wisdom whereby to learn our lessons and so apply them that we may know whereof we speak and knowing thus much be capable, also of choosing the ground which will lead not only ourselves to victory over circumstances, but guide us away from any point where we might be a stumbling-block in another's way.

However discouraging the statement that a barnyard fowl could not be an eagle, no matter how persistently he determined to wear the latter's plumage, might be; the consoling thought remains that the human being for whom this allegory might be designed does not in his present stage of development find himself in need of accepting the situation as final. Mankind has evolved to the plane where the individual is endowed with that great captain of destiny, the human will; and exercising this faculty, he can become whatsoever he wills to become. The vital point for consideration, however, is to be found in the fact that pretense will never aid development. The barnyard fowl may pretend to eagleship; but the truth is apparent, not only to the genuine eagle alone, but however deceived the conceited actor may be, however sincerely he may flatter himself he is playing well his part, it is very plain to every member of his own kind also, that he is nothing more than a pretender after all. "How shall we grow into eagles then?" asks some one. Ah! if you have been born a fowl, then, "ye must be born again." The eagle is not born a chicken and then nurtured into an eaglet; but he is ushered into being, one of his type. Is there any truth lurking within the words just quoted, "ye must be born again?" Surely there must be a lesson in them, else they had never been spoken by one of the world's great seers. What is this meaning, and how may we extract it from the form of sound in which it lies concealed?

Endeavoring to avail ourselves of its virtue, let us first consider briefly what birth, as we understand it, means to us. We know that ere the child is evolved to that degree of unfoldment which makes it impossible longer to dwell within the womb of matter where, though living and endowed with faculties wherewith to exercise consciousness, it is still blind and deaf and dumb so far as the outer world of living activities are concerned. It is only through the process of birth from out its hidden estate, birth into a plane or condition whereby it can breathe a freer air, and enjoy the exercise of its sense-faculties, that these same faculties can be of any use to the child. Briefly, this same truth applies to re-birth, or the words, "ye must be born again."

So long as the spiritual being, encased within the body of matter, is left to dwell with all its capacities dormant, all its mighty powers lying unused and worse still, unrecognized and unbelieved in, so long that spiritual self remains unborn. Once permit the stirrings of truth within the soul, once grasp the idea that there exists undreamed of possibilities within the fleshly body, meditate upon, study and reflect; aye, desire and pray "the truth may make you free" and lo! there is born into exercise such wondrous capabilities for happines and the development of the real or soul-body within, as will cause to vibrate and thrill and radiate life and light and joy with each living, breathing moment; and a great, unspeakable and indescribable existence will have been wrought out.

And now, wonder of wonders. Not only he may, but he must, wear the eagle's feathers. What does it mean to him, the individual? Ah! what does it not mean? Once being what he could only pretend before re-birth, and we see him, no longer strutting about in the humble haunts of the farmyard, but capable of grand and mighty flights, he can mount up into cloud-realms fearlessly, "with wing on the wind and eye on the Sun, sailing onward, right on," and landing at last on the cloud-piercing peaks that bid defiance to summer's sun and winter's snow, repose calmly in the strength which enables him to venture boldly where weaker wings dare not aspire, secure in the knowledge that amid the tempest's urge and sweep, in thunder's heavy roll and lightning's vivid glare, he is in his element; and that when he chooses, he can sail sweetly out under sunlight skies to rest in the smiles of Nature's happiest moods, and still be at home. Ah, even as he is to-day, and has been through the centuries of a remote past, the emblazoned figure upon the great seals of mighty Nations, symbolizing true greatness and strength, so we may fitly exalt him as an object typifying the evolved soul's progress as it mounts into supernal regions of power where the unborn spirit could only exhibit himself as a failure, when representing a condition not rightfully his due.

This individuality, this new-born spirit, conscious now of being freed in the atmosphere of truth, conscious of awakened powers and realizing that the rapt one who promised that "He who waits upon the Lord shall renew his strength like the eagle" really caught a glimpse of this wondrous view, believing that "all power is given him in the the heavens and the earth," knows that great achievements wait only upon the exercise of these spirit-born powers, will, ere long find himself able to stand before the gaze of assembled multitudes, grasp with steady hand the reins of thought, guide with clear logic the famed Pegasus of expression, and on the swift, strong wings of eloquence, breast the mountain waves of science, wisdom and truth, until, in glorious triumph, he plants his feet at last upon the shining heights of everlasting right, drawing after him by the fascination of voice and person, all vibrant with emotion—that living, breathing, pulsating something that speech alone sounds forth from the infinite depths of eternal life in waves that touch the very souls of those who listen.

Beside this mighty force, pretense alone will droop with weary wing; while truth—giant of being—soars into realms of wisdom where verbal formula alone cannot penetrate, and beats with strong and confident pinion the pulseless ether of abstract thought.

This it means to "be born again." This it means to be what one can only pretend while yet "not born of the spirit." Never again can the soul which is born forth into spiritual life, find itself groveling in the darkness of earthly passions and weaknesses. Never again will the consuming fires of jealousy and animalism reduce its powers to naught. Never again can the freed spirit be bound to any sense plane; nor be subject to the laws of the bond. Never again need the evolved and reborn spirit want for the clear ethereal draughts of life eternal, so long only spoken and thought of in the world of sense below. At any moment the liberated spirit may soar away to heavenly places and bask in the sunlight of pure love; eat of heavenly fruits and drink the wine of life. Most glorious of all is the thought that no need exists for us to abandon our earthly homes or duties here. Even as we perform the humble tasks needed to brighten daily living, though our lot may be one of toil and even privation, we may yet so dwell in "heavenly places" as will enable us to glorify every phase in such environment where we find our duties lie. This spirit exalts duty into a happy privilege. Transforms every task into a gladsome joy; and so illumines the entire sphere in which we find ourselves placed as will enable us to fully realize that when the barnyard fowl no longer seeks pretension to what he is not, but sets himself earnestly to the work of being "born an eagle," then, and not till then can he "wear the eagle's feathers."

Portland, Oregon.

Since my last communication to The Progressive Thinker I have gathered some items from the ranks of Spiritualists in Oregon, which I think will be of special interest to those whose minds are alert concerning the accelerated movement of Spiritualism. Its widening waves of influence are ever flowing outward and onward. At this time of the year, however, very many societies suspend services and close their doors for the summer. But the societies of this city are in marked contrast with this custom, every society keeping up service the year round. Though, to be sure, some of the regular public workers are taking a vacation, others are employed pro tem., having good audiences, so that Spiritualists here are not forced to the alternative of attending orthodox churches for two or three months in order to have some place to go.

It seems that a desire for a State Spiritualist Association for Oregon had been gaining ground until at last it culminated in a call for a meeting with that purpose in view. The meeting convened and organized a State Association, electing nine directors. Of these, four were elected officers as follows: J. H. Lucas, president, Mrs. Lucy A. Mallory, editor of the World's Advance Thought, vice-president, L. B. Larsen, secretary, and Capt. J. H. McMillen, treasurer. Their election was unanimous, and they are regarded as an excellent board of officers.

The work of organizing auxiliary societies, it is hoped, will be encouraged and promoted by the State Association. Mr. Lucas, the president, is giving much of his time in endeavoring to advance the cause in this city. His third term as lecturer for the First Spiritualist Society will close January 1 next, after which, perhaps he will devote more time in pushing the work of Spiritualism in other parts of the state.

Mrs. O. Cornelius, for many years a prominent and popular test medium in Oregon, has recently passed through an illness of several weeks duration, but is now convalescent, to the joy of her numerous friends.

The New Era Spiritualist camp-meeting, some miles south of Oregon City, began a few days ago with very encouraging prospects. D. W. Hull, recently from Kansas, is engaged for the entire term of the camp-meeting. COR.

Lake Brady Camp.

On Sunday, July 13, the writer and many other Canton people had the pleasure of visiting Lake Brady and being on hand the opening day of the camp of the Lake Brady Spiritualists' Camp Association. While the meetings this year will not be held in the old auditorium on the old grounds, they will be held just north of them in a lovely grove, a grove highly adapted for the purpose, and which it seems nature has especially provided for such meetings. The new grounds being isolated from the old, which at present are being run as a summer resort by men who are gentlemen and who stand high in Kent, their home, but who know little or nothing of the grand truths to be found in the philosophy and phenomena of Modern Spiritualism, it is far better than it was under the old plan, a plan that has existed for several years.

The new grounds, I have been told, contain fifteen acres, which touch on the north the Erie and Cleveland & Pittsburg railroads and on the south, the N. O. T. electric railroad, one of the best in the state, making it much more convenient for Lake Brady patrons coming there by either steam or electric road.

Sunday, the opening day, was an ideal one both as to weather conditions, large patronage and excellent spiritual food and entertainment. Upon this occasion Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie was the speaker, and at 10:30 a. m. and 2 p. m., she delivered lectures that were indeed inspired and were food for thought for the thinkers who were there. After Mrs. Gillespie's lecture in the afternoon she gave tests and messages that were clean cut, to the point; and readily recognized by those for whom they were intended. On the 20th and 27th Mrs. Amanda L. Coffman, of Grand Rapids, Mich., will have the platform, and it is useless to say that her audiences will be well pleased with the grand truths her guides will be ready and in position to promulgate.

Following Mrs. Coffman will come Brothers F. D. Dunakin and D. A. Herrick, and last but not least, that gifted speaker, Mrs. E. E. Carpenter, of Detroit, Mich. In addition to those gifted and noble speakers, the mediums that are now on the grounds are Mrs. Waterman, Mrs. Ebertshauser, Charles J. Barnes and others whose names I cannot at this time remember.

PROOFS PALPABLE.

Some Very Interesting Experiences by a Veteran.

THE MYSTERIOUS DISAPPEARANCE AND FINDING OF A COLLAR BUTTON, ETC.

In The Progressive Thinker there appeared an article entitled, "Proof Positive and Proof Palpable of an After Life," and on that subject I would like to give some of the evidence in the occult line, why I am a Spiritualist.

A Spiritualist is one who believes in a continuity of life and a communion with the so-called dead.

I will not attempt to give dates but will relate some of the experiences which came under my personal observation some four years ago.

Being as skeptical on the idea of getting communication from dead people as one could be, I was prompted by curiosity to give the subject some attention. While from a humane commonsense view it found a receptive lodgment in my heart's most earnest desires, as I could not entertain the thought of an eternal sleep, a separation, a banishment, a burning hell and an angry God; but rather sometime, somewhere, all would again meet under conditions adapted to their own peculiar environments, and again be reunited to kindred and the associations of friends, and thus my prejudices were not hard to overcome.

The proof, "Why I am a Spiritualist," begins with my first lessons.

While living on my farm north of Galesburg, Mich., that true and devoted man, Daniel Powers, informed me that a good medium, C. Fred Farrin, was stopping at his house, and if I desired he would bring him over to stay a few days. He came, but I could see nothing very uncanny about a medium; but I think the second day at our house at the dinner table, and there happened to be there a Mrs. Evans, from Galesburg, a lady of intelligence and a member of a church; and as we had just finished our dinner, Mr. Farlin remarked:

"There, they have taken out my collar button. They won't let me wear any cuff buttons, or anything plated or bright," and at the same time some one spoke through him, purporting to be an Indian, saying, "We have stuck it in the tree."

Just at the side door was a maple tree in full leaf, it being in June. I got up, stepped to the door and looked up, and about ten feet from the floor I could see the button in a leaf of the tree.

I got an old table, took it out, and got on the same and picked off the leaf with the button, and we all looked at it and wondered how it got there.

We all saw the button at the dinner table, and then we saw that it was gone, and his collar unbuttoned at the close of dinner.

I took the button from the branch of the tree fully ten feet high, and how did it get there?

A Mrs. Frank Reid was to lecture at the old church at Yorkville, taking her subject from the audience, given by Mr. Merrifield, a Universalist minister, as follows: "God's Plan of Salvation."

She handled the subject with ability. She was invited to accompany us home. She accepted the invitation, though an entire stranger, never had met her before. After being seated a short time, after arriving home and in a warm room, she said to me:

"I see a lady standing near you. She is in the spirit world." I fully recognized the description, but I asked her if she could select out the lady in a photograph. She thought she could, and at that date photographs were in lockets, about four inches square. Five or six were brought from an adjoining room. She picked up one, two, and then the third one, a perfect recognition of one who had passed to her spirit home a few years previous.

A Mrs. Holton, of Allegan, came through an entranced medium, and requested me to write a message to her husband and daughter, then in Allegan, but Mrs. H. was not in Allegan when she passed out. I wrote the message, sent it as requested, some thirty miles, and in a few days received an answer corroborating the facts as given through the medium, to our great surprise, as the medium had been a neighbor and associate with Mrs. Holton for a number of years.

Again a Mr. M. O. Streetor, an old pioneer of the township of Comstock, came to our house in company with his family for consultation, on the eighth day of June. The guides said to him:

"Mr. Streetor, I see a dark cloud hanging over your home in the form of sickness."

Nothing more was heard from Mr. Streetor's family until the fourth day of July, it being on Sunday. I got home about noon and found the medium on the couch. She requested me to sit down and see what the controls wanted, as they had been around her all forenoon. I sat down, and she soon became entranced and they wished me to get some paper, as a spirit wished to send a message to the family. I took the words as given to me, telling the cause of sickness, blood-poison from a nail in handling some old lumber. When they got through he gave me a name to sign to his letter, M. O. Streetor. Then the medium's guides came and said: "You will hear more about this before you go to bed." About six in the evening we called on a sick neighbor, and we were met by the daughter, and the first expression was, "Did you know Mr. Streetor was buried to-day? His funeral was at 10:30. Mrs. Galigan was up here this morning from Galesburg and she brought the news that he died from blood-poisoning arising from a nail-wound made while moving some old lumber.

Again, a Cousin Maggie, living in Albion came through the medium while fully entranced, gave to me in detail the day and hour that while her mind was in a delirious condition she administered to her own death, and in a few days we received a letter from her husband confirming the facts as given to me through media.

Again the late Daniel Powers, who passed away in Battle Creek, came through the medium and gave the time and all the details of his departure, as it was fully confirmed in The Progressive Thinker.

Mr. Hopkins, who passed away in Kalamazoo, was a firm and ardent Spiritualist; he came to me through a medium soon after his funeral, expressing great feelings of indignation that his people did not employ a Spiritualist to speak at his funeral instead of a so-called popular orthodox minister. He said he tried to kick the coffin-lid off, but could not, and we soon learned that it was a fact that an orthodox minister did officiate at his funeral. The above are only a few lessons in the kindergarten department. Why am I a Spiritualist? LEVI WOOD.

PROPHECY, PRESENTIMENT, ETC.

The Fate of Queen Victoria's Eldest Daughter; Not the Late Empress Dowager of Germany, but Sophia Adelaide, Who Died a Pauper in Exile.

"All the latest news from England," says the editor of the Washington Post of July 6, "leads to the conclusion that King Edward VII. will not only live to be crowned, but enjoy, perhaps, several years of fairly robust life. This is glad tidings for the friends of civilization everywhere, but deals a serious blow to the soothsayers, who have been pointing with pride to his illness as confirmation of the prophecy that though he should be king he would never wear the royal diadem."

It is true that the king has survived a critical illness, but his coronation is postponed; and what if he should not live to wear the royal diadem? But the editor continues:

"In our practical age it seems strange to hear sensible persons gravely discussing this phase of the episode, and strangest of all to note that the king himself has showed a little of the popular superstition. Yet cases of presentiment, pretty well authenticated, are not so rare as one might suppose. King Edward's father seems to have had, for some time before his death, a warning sense that the end was not far off, although he was still young enough to enjoy the promise of many years of activity. 'If I knew that those I loved were cared for,' he remarked to Victoria, 'I should be quite ready to die to-morrow.'

That remark was significent of something which was then suppressed by royal mandate. Queen Victoria's eldest daughter was a lonely exile when her father died, December 14, 1861, aged forty-one years. She was then in America. Prior to Albert's marriage to the Queen he had a morganatic wife, the Countess De Reuss, in France. The latter consented to a separation, and to a remarriage to the Count De Lundi, a most intimate friend of Prince Albert. But later, finding herself enciente by the Prince, she exacted terms from him with which he was compelled to comply. Her child, a female, was born November 8, 1840. Queen Victoria's daughter was born November 21, 1840—just thirteen days later. The Queen's nurse was bribed to co-operate in effecting an exchange of infants.

The Countess de Reuss survived only three months. Her own child, named Victoria Adelaide, grew up and became the wife of Emperor Frederick of Germany. Prince Albert often visited his daughter Sophia-Adelaide, whom he fondly loved, and told her to call him uncle. He provided a nurse for her who also became her tutor, named Lady Campbell. An ample fund was also provided for the maintenance and education of Sophia.

In 1848 the Count de Lundi was assassinated. Sophia was then eight years old. Thereafter Prince Albert told her he himself was her real father, and she might call him so, but only in private.

The funds for Sophia's support came at first directly from the Prince, then through an English clergyman who had no means of his own, and lastly through John Brown, the Queen's faithful attendant. But after the death of Brown the remittances ceased.

In 1887 Sophia-Adelaide published a little book setting forth her claim. It was suppressed in England, Germany and other countries. A copy of it is not now on sale even in America.

She came to America under the care of Lady Anna Campbell and George, the second Count de Lundi. He was seized by cholera at Dayton, Ohio, and on his deathbed disclosed to her the fact that Queen Victoria was her mother—a secret which had been kept from her up to that time. He further persuaded her to become his wife, believing that as his widow she would have better protection. The marriage took place an hour before he died. Lady Anna survived but a day or two; her death was sudden.

Sophia was then not quite sixteen years of age. Three years later she was married to a Mr. Kent, a man much older than herself. From a letter of her father advising her to return to Europe she feared a purpose to put her in a convent. Mr. Kent had attended to her affairs with discretion and integrity, and when he offered to marry her she deemed it advisable to accept him. Her reasons for so doing I now give in her own words:

"He made no inquiries as to my family or origin. My one thought in the matter was that I should have a protector. A married woman cannot be forced into a convent against her will; and this set my mind at rest concerning the contingency which had become the chief object of my fears."

She wrote to Prince Albert informing him of her second marriage and explaining the motives therefor. He replied affectionately, reproaching her for lack of confidence in him, assuring her that he never intended to put her in a convent, and blaming himself for having been primarily the cause of her imprudence.

I quote again from her narrative concerning her husband:

"He knew I was in the regular receipt of a very handsome allowance, which we shared amicably together, the source of which was a family secret. He filled the place of steward rather than a husband. He never inquired into my secrets. We lived on very strained terms with each other. If he had sought my confidence in the right way, if I had been able to detect in him a single spark of such devotion as had glowed in the hearts of Anna and the Count de Lundi, I should have been only too glad to have shared with some one the mystery of my life. I hoped at first the ice would be broken in time, but the years went by and our relations remained unchanged. * *

"I had been married some nine years when the dissipated conduct of my husband obliged me to break with him. I could accuse him only of peccadilloes, but there are some violations of decency that are as offensive to women as graver faults. He did not dispute my grievances against him, and we separated amicably."

For some ten years thereafter she traveled about Europe in a roving way. The secret of her birth gradually leaked out and became a matter of public notoriety. Then she was notified by the bank that the funds deposited to her credit were exhausted. Still she was not without friends, one of the best of whom was John Brown. He called on her and listened to her story. He seemed to have had previous knowledge of it, but would never commit himself on that point. He promised repeatedly to uphold her interests and defend her cause. In 1875, when the Queen was dangerously ill he sent her a message to come at once to —— Castle. On arriving there she was met by him, and he told her not to go to a hotel; he had prepared for her secret quarters in the castle. It seemed to her then that her fate was at last about to be decided. For the first time in her life, since infancy, she slept under the same roof with her mother.

She remained there forty-eight hours, hidden, trembling, a prey to agony and fear. Kind-hearted John came to her several times a day with news of the Queen's condition. She had so many people about her that she had not found a favorable opportunity for speaking to her. She was not even aware of her daughter's presence in the castle. On the second day he informed Sophia that the Queen was out of danger. But the daughter was compelled to leave without seeing her mother.

Brown could not understand why Sophia's allowance was stopped. He denounced it as an outrage and succeeded in obtaining a renewal of it for a much less amount. In 1882 John died. From that time the allowance ceased. She was utterly forsaken. It is said that the English court denounced her as an impostor, and she was warned that if she did not hold her tongue she would be imprisoned.

Many of the foregoing facts have been made public by the press in France, America, and to some extent in England.

When Sophia-Adelaide called on Dr. J. H. Gunther, in New York, six months before her death, he told her she needed food rather than medicine, and thereafter he and members of St. Joseph's church supplied her wants. She was afterwards sent to the German hospital, where she died July 4, 1901, and, but for the charity of her attending physician her body would have been taken from the morgue to the Potters' Field for burial.

Here let me repeat the remark of Sophia's father to his royal consort shortly before his death in 1861, as quoted by the editor of the Washington Post: "If I knew that those I loved were well cared for, I should be quite ready to die to-morrow."

What one of his offspring was not "well cared for," save the wandering exile Sophia-Adelaide? She was then in America, twenty years of age, married to her steward, but only for self-protection against a dreaded life in a convent, which however her affectionate father assured her was never contemplated by him.

Let me add that there was no love between Great Britain's Empress and Victoria-Adelaide, the wife of Frederick William of Prussia, whose son, the present Emperor William, doubtless knows that his mother was the daughter of a French countess. The Empress dowager died August 5, 1901. She had none of the features of Queen Victoria, but Sophia-Adelaide's face was so like that of the Queen that when I first saw her picture in print and before I knew anything of her story, I noted the striking resemblance.

As for the gipsy prophecy that King Edward will not be crowned, let us hope that it will fail, like most similar prophecies. Nevertheless the editor of the Post has to admit that such cases "are not so rare as one might suppose;" and he cites several remarkable forewarnings and presentiments.

Oh, rotten royalty! constituting "the powers that be" for the punishment of the innocent! For cogent reasons it was constrained to crush the Princess Royal of Great Britain!

WM. HENRY BURR.

Mediums and Mediumship.

To the Editor:—In Wm W. Aber's book, "Rending the Vail," page 282, I find the following from Dr. Reed:

"Among every nation of people that we have any record of, either historical or traditional, have existed individuals so sensitively organized that strange manifestations have taken place in their presence. Different races, different peoples and people of different ages have given to these individuals different names, and to-day they are known to the world as mediums.

"Mediumship depends more upon the magnetic conditions of the body that enable it to vibrate in perfect accord with higher forces, than on any peculiar mental capacity.

"Spiritualism is founded upon natural law; therefore all of the phenomena come through natural law.

"Comprehending this, it can be understood that the more perfect the instrument the better the work.

"You would not expect a musician to make beautiful music on an instrument that was not in tune, and much less should you expect the angel world to bring you perfect messages through an undeveloped medium.

"It has been just as essential in the past to observe conditions as it is now. You will find this fact attested in your Bible, even to color of cabinet curtains for benefit of the higher forces.—(Ex. 25:4; 26:1-31; II. Chron 3: 14.)

"One of the first and earliest phases developed is table-tipping and rapping.

"And it is the tiny rap that opened up the beauties of the world beyond for you mortals.

"Raps are produced by an electric concussion.

"We are able also to produce them through the exercise of our will-power in various ways.

"The latter method is used oftener than the former, because it is more readily understood by the lower forces.

"Then you have independent slate-writing, which is also produced through will-power exercised by the unseen forces, and is one of the best phases of physical mediumship.

"The mental phases are all the result of spirit hypnotism; and their excellence depends upon the mental capacity of the spirit operators as well as upon the brain of the medium—their subject.

"Materialization, the phase you are witnessing to-night, has been explained to you many times, so it is needless for me to say it is the highest as well as the most difficult of all physical manifestations; and the least understood; and therefore, should be the last phase for skeptics to investigate.

"When Spiritualists quit insisting that skeptics be allowed to enter a materializing seance, then and no earlier, will you begin to receive the highest manifestations in that phase of mediumship.

"Mediums should be cared for as you would care for a sensitive hot-house plant, for they are truly human sensitives.

"A true sensitive is like a sponge—takes up everything it comes in contact with.

"Therefore, if you wish your mediums to be pure, place them in pure surroundings; for like attracts like.

"Spirits are living in a world whose surroundings are as tangible to them as the earthly surroundings are to you.

In the World Celestial

Is a wonderful book, being the personal experiences of a man whose dead sweetheart, after appearing to him many times, etherealized, materialized and through trance mediums, has him put into a hypnotic trance by spirit scientists and held in that condition for ten days, which time he spends with her in the celestial spheres and then returns to earth with perfect recollection of what he saw and heard in that realm of the so-called dead. He tells his wonderful story to his friend who gives it to the world in his best style. This friend is Dr. T. A Bland, the well-known author, scientist and reformer. This book has a brilliant introduction by that distinguished preacher, Rev. H. W. Thomas, D. D., president of the American Congress of Liberal Religions, who gives it the weight of his unqualified endorsement. Everybody will be charmed with it, for it is not only a great spiritual book, but a most beautiful love romance of two worlds. It is printed in elegant style, bound in cloth and gold, and has a full page portrait of the angel heroine, from a spirit painting. Price, $1.00.

OCCULT MYSTERIES.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY FROM BRAIN TO BRAIN.

Latest Marvel in Mental Phenomena Under Scientific Development by the Psychical Research Society.

Communication that makes Marconi's wireless telegraphy seem crude and cumbersome in comparison is the aim of successfully conducted experiments that are making by the Society of Psychical Research in New York, Washington and elsewhere in America and in Europe. The society has its headquarters in London, with important branches all over the world.

Among its members are some of the foremost scientific men of the world. For years it has devoted itself to the thorough, patient and exact investigation of mental phenomena which have puzzled mankind since the beginning of time.

It has had much to do with establishing the therapeutic value of hypnotism and to secure its recognition on a scientific basis. Now it is devoting its energies toward establishing that most important factor in the advance of civilization—quick communication.

In brief, the members of the society have proved that it is possible for one person to communicate with another instantaneously, without the use of wires or elaborate apparatus, independent of all atmospheric and material conditions.

Thus far it has been demonstrated that persons can communicate with each other at a distance of 500 miles, and there is little doubt that these wonderful messages could be sent around the world.

No electricity is required for the transmission of these messages. In its place is used concentrated mind force, and the time occupied in transmitting a message is the time occupied in thinking about it.

QUICKER THAN LIGHTNING.

The difference between that and ordinary communication is the difference between sending a cablegram from New York and Yokahama and merely thinking of those two places.

R. Osgood Mason, A. M., M. D., fellow of the New York Academy of Medicine, a member of the Society for Psychical Research, author of "Telepathy and the Subliminal Self," "Hypnotism and Suggestion," and one of the foremost authorities on these subjects in America, said yesterday to a writer for the Sunday World Magazine:

"There is not the slightest doubt that there is systematic communication between individuals by other than the generally recognized methods. Experiments have been going forward for years, and if the progress made has been slow, it is nevertheless sure.

"The time will come when certain persons will be able to communicate with each other, no matter how widely apart they may be, with the same freedom, the same fluency and the same coplousness that characterize actual conversation. These fortunate individuals will have no need of mails nor of the telegraph. Simply by the exercise of their own will power they will be able to say whatever they please to the absent one with the certainty that they will be as well understood as if the recipient were within the sound of the voice.

"This privilege will not be granted to every one. More persons will be able to send mental messages than to receive them. I should say, at a rough guess, that not more than one person in fifty has a sufficiently sensitive mind to be able to understand the telepathic message.

"Whether or not this method of communication can ever have a practical commercial value I am not prepared to say. It is still in its infancy, and although it now seems improbable, he would be a rash man who would dare to say that it cannot be made of material use."

Sir William Crookes, one of the foremost British scientists, and sometimes called the prince of British chemists, inventor of the Crookes tube, which made the discovery and practical use of the X-ray possible, and of the radimoter; discoverer of thallium and former president of the Society for Psychical Research, has taken a more advanced ground. In a recent interview he prophesied that it would be possible before many years to send messages by purely mental force at the will of the thinker.

Like everything else this wonderful power is capable of development, and there is little done that minds can be so trained as to make the thought transference more exact and more generally effective.

Some experimenters are able to do away with all apparatus.

The important factors are the people themselves—a transmitter, or agent, who must be a person of very positive mind with unusual powers of concentration, and a receiver or percipient who has a mind that is very sensitive to all impressions, which the possessor has the power of reducing to a passive state at will. The experiments that have been made seem to show that as a rule men make the best transmitters and women the best percipients, but this isn't by any means a hard and fast rule.

A black screen is placed in a dark room and on this is arranged white cardboard about a foot in diameter, on which is written or drawn the word or figure which it is designed shall be transmitted. A stereopticon lantern projects a circle of intense white light upon the disc. The transmitting agent, sitting at a convenient distance, places before his eyes a conical tube, like a megaphone with an enlarged mouthpiece, which shuts out from his view any objects that might be visible from the reflected rays.

These things are simply to aid the agent in concentrating his mind upon the word or drawing to be transmitted—to assist him in visualizing it, to use the phrase of the scientific men. It isn't enough for him merely to see it, to be conscious of its presence. He must take in every part of it, feel that it is stamped upon his mind, so that if he should close his eyes he would still see it.

The receiver is placed in another room to avoid any suggestion of an understanding or of collusion. His eyes are bandaged and care is taken that he shall not be able to see even a ray of light which might tend to distract his attention. And for this same reason quiet is essential.

As a rule the printing or drawing on the disc is made by a third person, and neither the receiver nor the agent can have any previous idea of the message that is placed before them.

After concentrating his gaze upon the disc for a few minutes the agent feels his mind become a blank except for the object before him. It seems to make up his whole mental universe. If the agent closes his eyes and then walks into a lighted room before opening them he still sees the object at which he gazed so intently, but the black has become white and the white a smoky gray. By gaslight the whole appears bluish, approaching purple, and the black a luminous yellow.

Sometimes the percipient receives the message almost instantaneously, but that privilege is enjoyed only by an experienced one with a particularly sensitive mind that he can reduce to a condition of almost absolute passivity.

IMAGE CLEARLY SEEN.

He first sees wavy clouds, faintly luminous, which are followed by a pale bluish light, with a very bright centre upon which the word or drawing appears with a distinctness governed by his experience and receptivity.

If it be the first attempt of the percipient, he may not see the image at all or it may appear for a second and then disappear. But if he and the agent be expert the image will be large and luminous. Although it may appear only for a second or two at a time it will reappear several times.

If the message transmitted is a word, of course the receiver merely calls it out, but if it be a figure, and usually a geometric one is employed, the bandage is removed from the eyes of the percipient and he draws what he has seen. Sometimes he fails because he did not see the figure distinctly, sometimes because he cannot remember what he saw. Some of the figures thus reproduced are amazingly interesting, especially the part failures, which show that the percipient had a glimmering of the original figure.

Colors are transmitted with ease when the agents can succeed in visualizing them successfully. In fact, they seem to be easier to transmit than anything else, unless it be the sense of taste. The receiver seems to be more affected by the taste of salt or anything unpleasant than the agent is.

As the agent and the percipient grow more expert and experienced mechanical aids are dispensed with altogether and distance does not particularly affect the communication, although there are some obstacles which have not been identified to the transmission of "brain waves," as Sir William Crookes calls them.

These experiments are really telepathy, or thought transference, or mind reading, for the principle of communication is the same, no matter by what name it is called. There are hundreds and thousands of authenticated cases of the mysterious influence of one mind over another to the extent of making the subject mind understand a message.

DR. OSGOOD'S THEORIES.

In his book on telepathy, Dr. Osgood gives the latest scientific theories, including his own, as to the manner in which these messages are sent and received. He says:

"Telepathy has been the subject of careful study and experiment comparatively only a few years. And it can hardly at this early date expect better treatment at the hands of its critics. The theories or hypotheses that have been put forward regarding the method by which this telepathic influence or impact is conveyed may be noted as follows:

"That of a vibratory medium, always present and analogous to the atmosphere, for propagating sound or the universal ether propagating light.

"An effluence of some sort emanating from the persons concerned and acting as a medium for the time being.

"A sixth sense.

"A duplex personality or subliminal self.

"As regards the vibratory hypothesis, it would demand a variety of media to convey separately something corresponding to the sense of sight, the sense of hearing, and to each of the other senses, touch, taste and smell, as all these senses have been telepathically transmitted.

"Or else there must exist one single medium capable of transmitting these many widely different methods of sensation separately. Such a medium must also possess the power of penetrating or acting through intervening obstacles. And lastly, in addition to numerous apparently insurmountable difficulties and insufficiencies, there is no proof that any such vibratory medium exists.

"Regarding a vital effluence or some physical emanation or aura belonging to each individual, and by means of which communication is possible between two persons separated by too great a distance to permit communication by ordinary channels, it is at least conceivable that such an aura or personal atmosphere exists. And by some it is claimed to be demonstrated. But, admitting its existence, that it would be capable of fulfilling the numerous functions demanded of it in the premises is doubtful.

"That the telepathic intercommunication is accomplished by means of the sixth sense—a sort of compound of all other senses, with added powers as regards distance and intervening obstacles—was a hypothesis which has been urged by some, and is at least intelligible. But there is a large class of facts which utterly refuse to fall into line or be explained by this hypothesis.

"The hypothesis of different strata of personality—of a second or subliminal self—is the one which best fulfills the necessary condition, and it also harmonizes the greatest number of facts when arranged with reference to this idea. There is also real substantial evidence that such a second personality actually exists.

"We have considered the evidence which points to the fact, or at least the theory, of a subliminal self or another personality in some manner bound up in that complicated physical mechanism which constitutes what we term the individual.

MANY INCIDENTS CITED.

"We have seen that there are weighty proofs that such a secondary or subliminal, or if you choose so to designate it, supranormal, self actually exists, and that it exhibits functions and powers far exceeding the functions and powers of the ordinary self.

"We have seen it expressing its own personal opinions, its own likes and dislikes, quite different and opposite to the likes and dislikes of the ordinary self, having its own separate series of remembered actions or chain of memories, its own antecedent history, and its separate present interests, and especially performing actions altogether beyond the powers of the ordinary self.

"We have seen it going out to great distances, seeing and describing scenes and events there taking place—for example, Swedenborg at Gothenburg witnessing the conflagration of Stockholm; Dr. Gerault's clairvoyant maid-servant, Marie, in France, seeing the sad death of her neighbor's son, Limoges, the rope-maker, while serving in the Crimea; and also the serious illness of Dr. Gerault's military friend in Algiers.

STRANGE CASE OF FITZGERALD.

"Fitzgerald, of Brunswick, Me., saw and described the Fall River fire three hundred miles away, and Mrs. Porter, at Bridgeport, Conn., described the burning of the steamer Henry Clay while it was occurring on the Hudson River near the village of Yonkers.

"We have seen this same subliminal self in the case of Mr. Stead going out and acquiring desired knowledge relating to the location, occupation and needs of persons from whom he desired such information, and bringing it back and reporting it by means of automatic writing. Again, we have seen this subliminal self in the case of Mrs. Newnham perceiving the silently written and sometimes even the unwritten questions of her husband, and automatically writing the answers, and we have seen it producing hallucinations of hearing in the case of Leonore, causing Leontine to hear a voice reproving her for her flippancy.

"It will be seen, then, how wide and important is the range of phenomena in which the subliminal self appears as an active agent, impressing its own special knowledge, however acquired, its ideas, pictures and images on the primary self, and causing them to be perceived, remembered and expressed by it."

Many other remarkable incidents are given by the Society for Psychical Research to substantiate its claims of the practical wonders of telepathy.

IN THE OCCULT.

Telegraphing with Mind Force.

Members of the Society for Psychical Research are experimenting in Washington with wireless telegraphy apparatus, giving results far more phenomenal than any obtained by Marconi and his imitators. These scientists are transmitting and receiving messages over wide areas of territory, and the percentage of error is claimed to be less than that encountered by the Italian inventor during his elementary trials.

They employ transmitting instruments wrought of metal and wood. They dispatch single letters, words, or geometric designs. A great economy in their system is realized from the utter substitution of concentrated mind force for electricity. Chimerical as this enterprise may appear to the uninitiated, it yet bears with the prediction of that hard-shelled scientist, Sir William Crookes, prince of British chemists, fellow of the Royal Society, discoverer of thallium, inventor of the radiometer and X-ray tune, and former president of the Society for Psychic Research. Sir William in a recent interview prophesied that it would soon be found practicable to telegraph without wires by simply transferring thought from mind to mind at the will of the thinker.

FOR TRANSMITTING THOUGHT.

The transmitting instrument used in these experiments consists of a stereopticon lantern for projecting light, an easel supporting a blackboard or screen, disks of pasteboard marked with the letters, or words, or designs to be dispatched, and a conical tube to be held at the eye of the transmitting agent.

The black screen is set up in a dark room and the disks, in turn, are attached to its center. The disks are about a foot in diameter, are of white cardboard, and are impressed with the letters or figures of conspicuous size, printed in black.

The stereopticon projects a circle of intense white light, which exactly fits the round outline of the disk and brilliantly illuminates the latter, which thus becomes the only visible object in the darkened room.

The transmitting agent sits at a convenient distance from the illumined disk and holds to his eye the conical tube, which shuts from view any environmental object or objects which may chance to receive reflected light from the white cardboard. The transmitting agent faces the disk squarely in order that the light on it will be reflected into the tubes equally from all parts of the lighted surface. All of this paraphernalia, as has already been gleamed, is but a mechanical aid to perfect concentration, and is the best possible conductor of the message from the black screen to the brain.

The receiver comfortably sits or reclines in another dark room. His eyes are bandaged to shut out from his vision any intruding light rays which may be filtered through door or window cracks. Quietude is essential to the success of both agents. While the mind of the transmitter must be focused and concentrated with all possible force upon the visible portion of the message to be sent, that of the receiver must be equally passive, assuming that vacuum which the hypnotist demands prior to his first operations.

Both transmitter and receiver keep conscientious record of the messages dispatched and obtained. Unless he cause distraction a second person in the room with each may more readily do this. The disks must, of course, be arranged without the receiver's knowledge of their contents.

THE AFTER IMAGE.

After concentrating his gaze upon the black and white image, then closing his eyes, walking into a lighted room, and opening them, the transmitter sees in daylight the same figures clearly defined in reverse—the black being intensely white, the white of a kind of smoky whiteness. By gaslight the white appears bluish, approaching purple, and the black a luminous yellow. These are the after images of the disk. The receiver, on the other hand, while allowing his mind to remain passive, begins to see wavy clouds followed by a pale, bluish light, bright in the center. As he becomes more and more skillful the figures transmitted gradually appear in larger luminous forms, lasting each a moment, but reappearing perhaps several times.

A simpler experiment, adapted to any drawing room, may be conducted in this way: The transmitter sits before a table, his chair back to back with that of the receiver. The latter occupies, preferably, an arm chair. He faces a dark corner of the room and blindfolds his eyes, that his mind may not be distracted by objects about him. The transmitter then, in the presence of others, perhaps, draws from a pack of playing cards, and concentrates upon the design, color, and denomination of each produced. Beginners obtain more satisfactory results if experimenting with but two suits and two numbers in each suit. Many such packs may be arranged out of a dozen ordinary decks. However the cards may be arranged they are shuffled and drawn at random.

The shuffling and holding may be done by a third person, who keeps record of the card he sees drawn each time and that which the receiver claims to simultaneously see. In some experiments it is preferred to eliminate the court cards, using only the numbered denominations. Both the receiver and transmitter frequently imagine that they see the forms of cards undergoing change while efforts are being made to picture them firmly in their minds.

In experiments where sentences have been dispatched over distances as great as 200 miles, not only the exact thought intended for transmission but others incidentally occurring in the mind of the dispatcher have escaped to the receiver, together with the intended message. Sentences thus transmitted have been received audibly, as if spoken in the room of the receiver.

TWO LOVERS.

Two lovers by a moss grown spring,
They leaned soft cheeks together there;
Mingled the dark and sunny hair,
And heard the wooing thrushes sing.
O, love's best prime!

Two, wedded, from the portal stept;
The bells made happy carolings,
The air was soft as fanning wings,
White petals on the pathway slept.
O, pure-eyed bride!
O, tender pride!

Two faces o'er a cradle bent,
Two hands above the breast were locked;
These pressed each other while they rocked,
Then watched a life that love had sent.
O, solemn hour!
O, hidden power!

Two parents by the evening fire;
The red light fell above their knees
On heads that rose by slow degrees,
Like buds upon the lily spire.
O, patient life!
O, tender strife!

The two still sat together there;
The red light shone above their knees,
But all the heads, by slow degrees,
Had gone and left that lonely pair.
O, voyage fast!
O, vanished past!

The red light shone upon the floor
And made the space between them wide;
They drew their chairs up side by side;
The pale cheeks joined and said "once more."
O, memories!
O, past that is!

Lake Brady Camp.

The camp at Lake Brady opened Sunday, July 13, with marked success. The commodious tent was filled to overflowing. Cleveland sent a large delegation, and Akron and Alliance friends were present in full force. Mr. and Mrs. Keck entertained the speaker, and I can truly say that no more comfortable resting-place has been my fortune in all my camp work than at their pretty camp home.

Mrs. Holles, of Alliance, was presiding officer and filled the chair with dignity and grace.

The music was very good and much enjoyed by all.

The day was perfect, and general harmony made the work a labor of love, and I will say to all workers and friends who intend visiting the camp, you will find a warm welcome and a delightful season at Lake Brady.

The lectures and messages were enthusiastically received. Lake Brady is all right. ANNA L. GILLESPIE.

LILY DALE CAMP.

The following speakers are yet to hold forth at the Lily Dale camp:

Lily Dale Camp.

One week of camp nearly gone, and in passing the days have been filled with beauty, pleasure, wit and wisdom; making a pleasant medley to hang in memory's picture gallery.

Mrs. Twing and Moses Hull were the first speakers. Prof. Lockwood came next with the first of the series of class lectures to be given by himself and J. Clegg Wright again this season.

Thomas Grimshaw and Miss Harlow are next on the list for this week, Mr. Grimshaw filling a vacancy made by the non-arrival of Rev. Frank.

All of these workers are too well known to allow of any doubt as to the quality of intellectual food presented.

Lily Dale management will have only the best. There are many mediums already here. Of these are F. Corden White, the Keelers, Miss Danforth, the Wilcoxes (materializing), Mrs. Carpenter, Mrs. Zoller, of Washington, D. C., Maggie Turner, Mrs. Barton and others whose names I have not learned, and more coming.

President Gaston is everywhere present, untiring in his efforts to make the camp complete in every feature, and assisted by his co-workers, succeeds to the satisfaction of all.

The Willing Workers (auxiliary to the association) are taking up their work under the direction of Mrs. Twing, and hope to excel even their success of last year.

The Grand Hotel is eliciting much praise under the management of the new landlord, Mr. Abbott. The restaurants and boarding houses report good patronage. There are still rooms and a few cottages to be had, all comfortable and pleasantly located. Board can be had by the day or week, and rooms at very reasonable prices.

Books and periodicals at the library afford many hours of profitable enjoyment.

All in all, Lily Dale is the place to come to. MARY WEBB-BAKER.

The Spread of Spiritualism.

The spread of Spiritualism has been phenomenal in the extreme since the very time of its advent; due to many causes that have worked in harmony in the face of the bitterest foe that ever confronted a reform, in fact the foe that has fought every reform since time and intellectual progress began—the church.

Almost simultaneous with the inspirational writings of the Poughkeepsie seer, Andrew Jackson Davis, came the Rochester rappings, as if all doors of the spirit world were thrown open at once and the drama of life so long hidden exposed to view.

There came the philosophy and phenomena hand in hand to tell the world there is no death, and prove it. There came the page, the index and the record. There came the information and the proof. There came the announcement and the arrival of our loved ones whom we thought lying in the cold, damp clay, awaiting, as we were told, the sound of a mighty horn.

No wonder the world was amazed; no wonder the churches called it the Devil, for they had heard no horn; no wonder those ignorant old howling Christians cried out against it. The coming was so sudden and curious.

A common peddler knocked at the door and it was opened by little children, incapable of performing a great deception, incapable of concocting a scheme to deceive the whole world.

It was a fact and wisely planned by those upon the other side; planned so that the world must receive it, and the more bitterly it has been fought and opposed the more phenomenal its growth and spread.

Soon came the Spiritualistic press, and the world began to read not only of these occurrences, but other and new phenomena in all parts of the world, and come to find out many people had had strange experiences, but took them to the priest or preacher only to be told "It is the Devil, put it down."

No doubt the dear loved ones had been trying to inform those left behind that they were not dead for a long time and were driven away by those whose eyes they sought to open and whose ears they would speak into.

And while a great prejudice has yet to be overcome ere we can bring all the world to a point of sensible investigation, honest research, and open-mindedness, we are making rapid strides.

A correspondent wonders "why so few Spiritualists take at least the leading Spiritual papers when the price is within easy reach."

Now this would seem a poser if we were not quite so used to philosophizing upon the same question.

In the first place the phenomena often come to those who never read any kind of literature, and can and does come to those who cannot read or write and yet have eyes and ears, and through the physical manifestations become ardent Spiritualists, but aside from attending a seance or visiting a medium and getting a message do not assist in the spread of Spiritualism, and remain in ignorance of the philosophy and the progress of the cause. Their Spiritualism is narrowed down to a visit with a loved one, and they become the easy dupes of the fakirs. This may be "none of our business," in their way of thinking, but it helps to feed and stimulate the tricksters, the element that keeps the flame of prejudice alive and thereby injure the cause they espouse.

We do not publish the names of all those reported as tricksters, because the judgment may often come of prejudice, envy, jealousy or ignorance, and the press is in no position to discriminate and might injure a genuine medium; but we do present in many ways the methods by which the genuine may be known from the false.

We cannot expect people to patronize the press who have no taste for literature, and to-day with all our boasted millions of Spiritualists it takes the closest kind of scheming to induce enough of them to subscribe to keep the papers in circulation and not lose money in the attempt.

We know whereof we speak, and when these kind and sincere Spiritualists get time, after the spasmodic enthusiasm of finding the lost friends has subsided, and they will look over our premium offers, their musty libraries may be replenished with just the books and the paper, at a very meagre sum, that will touch a responsive chord in the souls of their children, if they themselves do not care for them.

We are glad Spiritualism can reach a class the press cannot, but for the benefit of the coming generations we hope to establish a Spiritual library in every Spiritualist's home in the course of time, for it means the perpetuation of those principles of truth that must grow and spread with time.

The tide is turning and the world is recovering from the shock of the glad tidings of great joy that came with the advent of Spiritualism sufficiently to think and reason and enquire into the cause of these phenomena, and the most popular literature to-day is that which hints and smacks of the occult. The most popular minister is the most liberal, the most sensible and the most free from sectarian bias. He is the man of the world, working for universal freedom, and with this state of affairs we have great hope for the future of Spiritual literature and the ultimate success of the whole cause.

SPECTERS OF LIVING PERSONS

Mr. J. H. Pratt Relates Some More of His Marveloss Psychic Experiences at His Home in Spring Hill, Kansas.

The Rev. James Davies, a Congregationalist minister, settled in this town when I did. I lived on a farm from the fall of 1859 to 1882, three miles from Spring Hill. I bought property in the village late in the summer of 1883. In 1886 Dr. Davies was settled at Pullman, Washington Ter. At a seance in my house he appeared in materialized form and told my wife that he had written a letter to me, and that I would soon get it. The third day after, I got the letter. It took six days for a letter to come from Pullman. The fact of his ability to materialize was disclosed by his letter. This I knew.

After Mr. Aber came, I saw Jacob Hurd, C. R. Bell and Mary R. Morton. I felt convinced that he could materialize. His letter explained the difficulty in connection with facts that will be made known before this article is concluded. His letter stated that he had been very sick; so sick that he had been entranced. He stood before me in spiritual form, face to face. He saw an angel cross over the stream, and place a cross on him, and told him he must wear it for a while.

The mind is the soul, and the soul is the image of the person. When my mind is in New York, the image of the person is there. This I have proved substantially.

The sensation of Dr. Davies' case was to be reconciled by facts and live, or let the matter sink into oblivion, and let the churches be our highest and clearest expression of thought.

After seeing Dr. Davies at the cabinet window, and knowing him to be alive, two questions arise: That he lived was true, and that we saw him at the cabinet window was just as true. We were called on to prove it, and we did.

I was out gathering beans in my garden, in a deep study as to how Dr. Davies could appear at our cabinet window and be alive. When I had solved the question, Bro. J. T. Haughey came out to the place where I was working. I suggested the law to him. He considered with me.

He went to his home in Paola. Over that night he lived in his mind intensely at my home in Spring Hill. Nothing was said to a single soul about the experiment. We had sixteen persons in the seance, all of whom were acquainted with Mr. Haughey. When the seance was going on, and the last one was seated before another was called, it rang out around the circle, "Haughey! Haughey!" The experiment worked to a charm. It was faultless from any point of view. There was no collusion.

The third experiment was soon afterward made. I was down to Spring Hill when I saw Augustus Wills, a commercial traveler. I insisted that he should go home with me. He pleaded want of time. I insisted that he stay at the seance, and that if he would comply with what I suggested, he could see his mother. Finally he agreed to stay. Then I indited a short message to his mother at Atchinson, Kansas. He telegraphed it to her. It was known why he stayed. At near eight o'clock p. m., he and I were called up to the aperture, to be confronted by his mother.

The fourth case was as follows. I had written a letter to the Hon. Johnson Clark, of Kansas City, Mo. The evening that he got the letter he materialized at my own house, fully thirty miles away. We were not expecting it. He was not then in our minds. It was performed by the spirits.

The wife of Mr. Clark said that he got my letter by nightfall; read it and fell into a profound sleep, and slept for two hours or more while he materialized in our seance.

The last case of this series was when I had Mr. Aber at Paola, Kansas, at the house of Dr. Knapp. It was on the anniversary of my birthday, Jan. 15, 1890, when my mother materialized as plainly as the noonday sun, with her cap on which she always wore. Her small and delicate hand was thrust out of the cabinet window. Undoubtedly her mind was dwelling intently on the scene that gave me an independent existence, and I the subject which excited her thought. She died June 24, 1894, aged ninety-one.

A scene with the Rev. Dr. James Davies I will relate exactly as it occurred. My wife and self went to hear him preach, May 29, 1885. We went early and seated ourselves near the pulpit. After he commenced preaching, there were two others in the pulpit. They were spirits. They were invisible to all but me. The male spirit stood erect to the right and west of Dr. Davies; he was three inches taller; his hair was black and his complexion very dark; his hand passed above Dr. Davies' head to inspire him while he was preaching. He told me he was an uncle on the mother's side. He showed me a large chronometer watch and scientific instruments. The clothing he wore was made of brown twilled cotton. His coat was like the old-fashioned hunting-shirt, only it was longer and more neatly made. It was three-plaited behind with a band three inches wide fastened to the center of the plaits and buttoning in front. His pants fell loosely and were made ordinarily. His hat was made in the form of a sugar loaf, with rim three inches or more wide, with a band five-eighths of an inch in width, and fitting close to the head, while the hat was a little space of half an inch from his head and fastened to the band.

The female was his wife. She was about the average in height, and in form fully developed; her head large in the perceptives and high in firmness and conscientiousness. I told my wife literally what I saw and what the male spirit said, while coming from the church. The next morning Dr. Davies came to my house. It was unusual for him to come at all on Monday morning. We had just eaten breakfast, and I had taken up Victor Hugo's Les Miserables to read, and was about to sit down, when he came. After the usual salutations were exchanged, and he was seated, I told deliberately all that I had seen and heard, and described the spirits I saw with him on the day before. While I was telling him he listened with rapt attention. He gave no indication as to whether it was true or false.

When I was through, he sat a few moments thinking over what I had said. At last he spoke:

"You have seen my Uncle Robert Moffitt who was a long while in South Africa among the Zulus, and the lady whom you saw was Aunt Annie." I think that was the name that he gave me. The name I do not remember as well as the facts.

As he was clad, and the chronometer watch referred him to a strange and warm station on the globe, I called his attention to the fact that he had never mentioned them to me, to which he agreed. He said he often felt their presence around him of late; that his Uncle Moffitt had been dead eight months.

Another psychic incident he related to me. He said that it was his custom to send his family to bed and blow out the light, and meditate. "On one Sunday night in October, 1885," said he, "a parishioner of mine in Canada appeared as I sat for some minutes." He was certain that he was dead. I told him that it was evidently not so; that I thought it probable that he was in great distress, and was at that time writing; that he was writing "with his mind fixed intently on you, and he projected his astral self on you." At the time that a letter should come, it came to Dr. Davies, recounting his great loss of all his property, and yet he was happy.

One more incident of his narrative. While he was stationed at Pullman, in 1887, he was called seventeen miles from his home to a neighborhood in which no one knew him, or had ever seen him before. He heard of an accident that occurred on the day before, of a lady being thrown from her horse, and severely injured. His sensibilities were acute and quickly aroused, and he was on the way to her home as soon as he heard the story. When he got there, she rose in her bed and greeted him with "How do you do, Mr. James Davies? I saw you coming and heard your voice before you came." He said he counseled with her some time affectingly, and as he went through the gate, he took out his handkerchief to wipe his eyes, when suddenly there appeared a spirit in white whom he knew, at once dried his tears. The Rev James Davies was a man of ripe intelligence, educated in Nottingham, England, and is now in South Dakota, preaching.

The Crimes of Education.

Bishop Conaty, the rector of the Catholic University at the National Capital, has a low opinion of education dissociated from religion, says the Chicago Tribune. "The advancement of education," he says, "has been accompanied by an increase in intellectual vice." The results of our educational efforts appear to him to be "bank defalcations, Senate briberies, postal fraud, stock gambling, and literary degeneracy." The conclusion to be drawn is that for an irreligious world, reading, writing, and ciphering are a curse instead of a blessing. For the man who cannot write cannot be a forger, and he who knows nothing of figures cannot cook up fraudulent accounts.

Bishop Conaty's indictment of education which is not infused with religion is not a novelty. Protestant divines have expressed sentiments essentially the same as those of the Catholic prelate and educator. The only difference has been that they think instruction in the Protestant religion is needful to make education of real value, while he is of the opinion the religious instruction given should be that of his church. The point is one which has been argued over for some centuries and will be argued over for a long time to come.

There is an increase in what Bishop Conaty calls "the crimes of educated people," and there has been in some quarters a decrease in what may be called "the crimes of uneducated people." There is in England, according to one observer, a decrease in crimes of force and an increase in crimes of fraud. It is not to be wondered at that as the percentage of educated people increases the number of crimes such people alone can commit should increase also. Knowledge is not a preventive of crime. Whether the percentage of increase in crime is equal to the percentage of increase of educated people is another matter. No evidence has been submitted to show it is.

The "crimes of educated people" have not been unknown in the past in communities, Catholic and Protestant, where the schools have taught religion and thus, so Bishop Conaty says, have taught morality. It is a matter of opinion whether, if secular education were conducted as Bishop Conaty and those who agree with him and think it should be conducted, there would be a falling off in the number of crimes which illiterates cannot commit.

The question never can be put to a test in this country, for the secular schools will not teach religion. Instruction in it will be left to the church school, the Sunday-School, and to other powerful and efficient agencies. Therefore the men who sincerely believe the secular schools are fatally defective accomplish nothing by depicting in such black colors "the results of our educational efforts." At the most, they simply irritate some of those who do not agree with them and who are of the opinion that the world is more moral now than in the days when education was controlled exclusively by a church.

Religious education, according to the Catholic view, is education in which the faith, tenets, rites and observances of the Roman Catholic church are instilled into the minds of children and all school attendants, by Catholic teachers and priests. Such religious teachings as might be given by Protestants, Mohammedans, Confucians or Buddhists, however exalted in ethics, or strenuous in religiosity, would not be accounted religious in any accepted Catholic view of the subject. Education must bear the distinctive Romish brand, must be of a dyed-in-the-wool Romish tint and color, to be entitled to the name "religious."

Now, as a commentary on this Romish view of religious teaching, we have only to look at Spain and other intensely Catholic countries, where the schools and the whole system of education has been under the control of the church, and "religion," of the genuine Romish brand, has been the principal thing taught therein. In no other countries in the world does crime so much abound in its varied forms. And some crimes become so common that they are scarcely regarded as crimes at all.

If we look nearer home, there is one thing that contravenes the Bishop's indictment, and that is the indubitable fact, borne out by statistics, that a relatively larger proportion of crimes are committed by persons educated under Catholic religious influences, than are committed by any other religiously or non-religiously educated class.

The fact is, on the whole, the non-religious class of people—among whom for the purposes of our argument we will include Spiritualists and Freethinkers of all shades of opinion—present a far better array, morally considered, in the statistics of the penitentiaries and other available records of crime than is presented by the Catholic or Protestant religious denominations—and this is especially true when the comparison is made between Spiritualists and non-religious people and those who have been brought up under Catholic educational religious bias.

Knowledge, of course, gives an added power to commit some species of crime; but while knowledge may not be a preventive of crime, it certainly is not an incentive to crime. Far more an incentive to crime must it be to instill the religious belief that "remission of sins" can come through confession to a priestly absolver, or through some other way whereby one's sins (crimes) can be cast upon another, an innocent person, who will bear them all and "pay it all—all the debt I owe."

Far more wisely and with far greater effectiveness for good, might Bishop Conaty and all other hankerers after "religious education," train their speech against the evil results of religious miseducation, which is the staple brand of education furnished by the religionists who want all education under their control.

Laughter a Liquor Cure.

Farce comedy as a cure for alcoholism was the recommendation of Prof. William Norman Guthrie in his lecture at the University of Chicago. The lecturer was speaking on "The Contribution of Gayety."

"The great defect in American intellectual and moral life is the lack of gayety," he said. "We take things too seriously. Sometimes we indulge in a little gayety, but do so on the sly as if we were ashamed of it. All this tends to hypocrisy.

"Comedy—and particularly gay comedy—can do a great deal of good. A hearty careless laugh helps people to forget themselves. A good, bright comedy lifts men out of themselves, somehow or other. They must be helped to get away from their worries. And if you don't do it by means of comedy they will find a cheaper substitute—alcohol. This is the way to fight the alcohol evil. All work and no play makes Jack not only a dull boy but a bad one.

"When gayety leaves a community, goodness goes. People talk about the terrors of a French mob, but for really dreadful power give me British or American mobs when once you get them mad. Gayety saved the French people. After the war with Germany it was gayety that enabled them to settle back to work and pay their immense debt without being crushed by it. Instead of worrying over it they set to work with as much life and spirit as they could and things went on happily and soon they were all right again.

"I tell you this is a good means of reform. When you can't get rid of an evil it is better to have the courage to laugh at it than to sit down and weep over it."

A Welcome Fact.

Imagine a world like ours, peopled for unknown ages with human beings, to whom, though the thought of immortality had been known, there had never been practical evidence that conscious continuous existence after death was a truth. Men wondered if it could be true, wondered if this thought and this longing after immortality could find fulfilment in that world unseen to which all are hastening, there "to be, or not be."

Would it not seem that a single sound, or one clear gleam of light flashed from the unseen world would be hailed with universal acclamations of rejoicing?

Theology has for centuries been teaching immortality, but without practical proof or demonstrative evidence to satisfy the mind beyond doubt. Its appeal has been to a past record, of doubtful authenticity, which could not carry conviction to a doubting mind. In a matter of so great moment, the soul wants demonstrative truth on which to rest.

Theology, with all its assertiveness and insistency, left the world vacillating between hope and fear, with doubt and skepticism, in the more inquiring minds, gradually prevailing over blind faith. The "pleasing dream of immortality" was gradually changing into the nightmare of materialistic belief, under the teachings of a science that ignored the spiritual.

Modern Spiritualism came, with its clear and practical message from the unseen world of spirits.

The man of science—so-called—flouted it as mere deception; the theologians declared it was the Devil.

But many of the common people heard it gladly, and furnished the proof for which they had long been wishing, of conscious individual existence beyond the grave.

Spiritualism has brought assurance that we shall live and progress in a spirit world; that if we live pure and aspiring lives here, we shall carry our spiritual qualities with us into the spirit life, and so go on in higher unfoldment, in a world of purity, beauty, love and harmony.

Is not Spiritualism, then, a welcome fact?

INFORMATION.

Many of our subscribers seem to be laboring under a mistake regarding our new premium book, the title of which is "RELIGION OF MAN AND ETHICS OF SCIENCE." This is the title of ONE book, not two, and costs but 25 cents when ordered with the paper for one year.

"The Majesty of Calmness, or Individual Problems and Possibilities." By Wm. George Jordan. Another valuable little work. Price 50 cents. For sale at this office.

THE HOME CIRCLE

To the Editor:—I see by the number on my paper and also by postal received, that my subscription expires on the 19th of this month. I hereby renew the same, and also send you the addresses of four new subscribers, to whom please send The Progressive Thinker and premium book, the Religion of Man and Ethics of Science. We have only a few Spiritualists in this city, and it is hard work to get people interested.

Having noticed the articles written on experiences and benefits of the Home Circles, we came to the conclusion to start one of our own; and after about one year of patient sitting, we were rewarded by the development of one of our number, Mr. Albert Scherer, who is now a good trance medium. We also have the promise from our guides that we will have materializing, trumpet, and trance speaking among other members soon.

We have the satisfaction of positively knowing that we are not defrauded by some fake medium, and I know that before long we will be able to show the people of this creed-bound, orthodox city a few facts that they did not dream about. We are not quite ready yet to give much to the public, but I think before long you will hear from us again.

Adam a Chinaman—The Garden of Eden in the Yellow Empire.

It would be inferred that the progress of the age ought to have carried the more enlightened out of the fog of theology, and away from the myths of the Bible. It is expected of those of the Rev. Jasper type that they will make assertions that cause sneers or smiles by their childish contradictions of demonstrated fact. In the walks of science, such reversions to past ages of thought are not looked for, yet there are many instances. It is often the case that men who in childhood were brought up in strict orthodoxy, become freethinkers in middle age, and then in old age revert to their early belief, and confess, with prayer, to their priests, who exult in the funeral sermon over the saving of such lost souls. There are instances where early training, combined with heredity of belief, makes a fossil out of a living man.

This is clearly illustrated by Prof. Burton of the great liberal University of Cornell. He has been studying the Biblical account of the Garden of Eden. Of course he sets out with the firm belief that the Bible story is absolutely true, and at a time when scarcely a thinking person in the world looks on the narrative as anything more than a myth of the childhood of man, of no more value than the folk-lore of Jack of the Bean-stalk, or the Giant Killer, he has implicit faith.

He says he has weighed the Egyptian claims to the earliest civilization, and found them wanting. In comparison, those of China make them as nothing in their antiquity. The first start was made in the Celestial Empire. The Garden of Eden was certainly located in the Yellow Empire, and watered by its great rivers. Adam was a slant-eyed, pig-tailed, pigeon-toed Chinaman, and Eve a pinch-footed yellow beauty. Cain, Abel and the Adams girls, and all the other Biblical celebrities were, of course, of the same type.

The original language, the God-tongue, was Chinese klick-klack. If this be true, mankind have greatly improved on this dogma. We suppose that the next step will be digging for the universal root-words in the Chinese hieroglyphs, and, of course, finding what is sought for!

Granting Prof. Burton's theory, so pleasing to the unrest of the theologians, who feeling the solid ground falling, grasp at every straw, we are ready to inquire whether we owe China a debt of gratitude or a sound flogging by the "combined powers." Surely, if the parental pair were Chinese, and the garden was in the midst of that kingdom, then as dutiful children we should do our best to preserve the decayed civilization of our yellow progenitors, and organize pilgrimages to the holy shrine—birthplace of all races.

But again, if Adam and Eve were slant-eyed celestials, they are responsible by their escapade with the devil in the form of a snake, for the fall and all the following misery of mankind. It shifts the white man's burden to the yellow man, for he it is who has "ways that are dark and tricks that are vain," and as the white descendent cannot adequately punish the original pair, vengeance should be meted out to their more immediate descendents. Hence the justice of the "combined powers" unleashing the dogs of war on the guilty race, as the Hebrews were let loose on the fertile lands of Canaan to loot, torture, and divide the kingdom. Justice and vengeance has waited ten thousand years; that is about the antiquity arrived at by the Cornell man, but they have awoke at last to their opportunity and an open door made to the Garden of Eden. There it will be found by the pilgrims from the western world, stretching out in immense plains of oozy rice-fields between the sluggish rivers and the lowly reed the caricature of the tree of Life.

A Pleasant Affair.

The marriage of Mr. J. W. Pope and Mrs. Mary L. Frink, which occurred June 22, at Cleveland, O., was an exceedingly pleasant affair. Only the most immediate friends were invited to attend at the beautiful residence of the bride, and witness the ceremony. Hudson Tuttle officiated, and after brief remarks, wherein he spoke of the beauties and responsibilities of the marriage relation, and that the contracting parties had come to a full understanding, and by their mutual sympathies were already united in heart, pronounced them husband and wife.

The ceremony was performed under an arch of evergreen, fern and smilax, with Marguerite daisies. After the collation the happy pair bid their guests good-bye, taking the evening boat for the upper lakes for an extended bridal tour. They will not be "at home" until September.

Both the bride and groom are well-known Spiritualists in Cleveland. Mr. Pope is an active business man, a thorough gentleman, of marked integrity, and the bride one of the most lovable. Their friends unite in prayers for their happiness. The occasion was remembered by many exceedingly beautiful gifts of china, silver, paintings and furniture.

A Song and a Truth.

A song grew out of my unfolding soul,—
A miracle of sweetness and of strength,
It held the rhythm of the universe!
I sang it to the never-failing stars;
I murmured it in leafy solitudes;
I woke the thunder of the caverned hills
With its completeness. All elate with joy,
And glad to generosity, I placed
My perfect song into the lips of men;
And lo! instead of harmony I heard
The wild notes of confusion, the harsh tones
Of discord and disorder, the fierce swell
And dissonance of Passion's hateful voice.

A sacred truth was born within my soul:
Divinely fed, it was the life of life,
And made my earthly state a paradise.
Out of my heaven into the worldly hell
I dropped that pure white truth; and it became
The father of all license,—the foul sire
Of lust, with all its heritage of lies!

And was my perfect song forever lost?
Can death or change annihilate a truth?

I can not grieve or doubt; for I have seen
By spirit-vision waiting angels bend
Above the seeming ruin I have wrought,
Their faces glorious with the smile of faith.

COL. R. T. VAN HORN.

Col. R. T. Van Horn, well known throughout the West, passed through Chicago last Friday on his way to Lily Dale camp. Each year he makes a pilgrimage to that beautiful resort, and enjoys himself as a man should who is about 80 years young.

That the officers of Lily Dale may know the distinguished personage they are entertaining, we will state that we have known the Colonel for about forty years. As a journalist he has had no superiors in the great West, standing for a long time at the head of the most prominent daily of Kansas City, Mo. His leading Sunday articles in that paper (they might be called sermons) attracted a great deal of attention. The gems of thought they contained were soul-illuminating; in fact, they have never been equaled by other modern writers. Geo. H. Hepworth's Sunday sermons in the New York Herald—a grand feature of that paper—were commenced, we have been told, because of the interest excited by Col. Van Horn's Sunday articles in the Kansas City Journal. Thus it is that the West leads in all things great. But Mr. Hepworth's Sunday sermons never equaled those by Col. Van Horn, in beauty of thought, in exalted conception of nature's primal forces, and in those sublime sentiments that blend the material and spiritual worlds in harmonious lines. It is needless for us to say after these encomiums, that Lily Dale may well feel proud of its distinguished guest, Col. R. T. Van Horn.

A Correction.

To the editor:—I note a typographical error in my communication as published in last issue, which misrepresents me. In the last column, near the top, speaking of not being a test medium, the types made me say: "This is one branch of 'deplorable' effort upon which my school can be of no use to me." It should have read "desirable" effort, which makes quite a difference.

MEMORIES.

Oh! mem'ries do not crowd so fast
Into my heart to-night;
Can you not let the poor dead past
Lay hidden from my sight?

Give but a time of calm content;
Let tortured thoughts be o'er;
And let the gray of life be blent
With rainbow tints once more.

No? Then be just, for far adown
The past, some places fair
Must lift their shining heads to crown
My after life of care.

Home faces gleam in that dim aisle,
Home love lights that dark way,
And loving words and tender care
Illume that far-off day.

The path grows steep—injustice eats
The core of hope away,
But some true heart forever beats,
"And brings a brighter day."

But, oh! that time, when they had passed
And still I must keep on,
Then was the anguished curtain drawn
My fondest hopes upon.

I try to pierce the veil which falls
So thinly, us between;
I cannot see, but faith loud calls,
I know—though all unseen.

I feel their nearness—trust their love;
They cheer and warm my heart;
As much as earthly loved ones,
They're of my life a part.

They know my motives, and whate'er
My faults and virtues are,
They love me still—nor love me less—
I feel that strength afar

So memory—stalking grim, between
The aisles of long ago,
You cannot paint the pictures out
That Hope's bright fingers show:

The Present and the Future hold
Rich gifts of loving dower,
Which sometime will be mine to fold—
Some time—some day—some hour.

DEATH OF A NOBLE WOMAN

From Wedding Bells to Funeral Dirge.

On the evening of July 8, Rev. John Rusk, of the Church Militant, Chicago, at his own home, united in marriage, Mrs. Irene M. Dobson, the well-known South Side medium, and Prof. Ernest Salvator. Acquaintances had recognized foreshadowings of their union, while close friends had known of their existing engagement. Invited guests gathered at the home of the happy couple on the following evening to extend congratulations and wishes for them many and useful years together. All had recognized in the bridegroom a gentleman of culture whose magnetic force, psychic powers and innate tenderness would shield and strengthen his companion. Before the party separated, Dr. Beckwith, one of the bride's controls, announced that some one then present would be missing when they should meet together on July 4, 1903.

On July 8, Mrs. Salvator was taken with severe symptoms which her physician in the body and associate counsel diagnosed as acute appendicitis. She was reluctantly taken to the Baptist Hospital. On Sunday morning she felt so much better that she asked to be returned to her home, but three physicians in council decided that only the knife could possibly give more than fleeting respite to her excruciating sufferings. She underwent the operation on the afternoon of that day. Because of long and severe drains in by-gone years on her never robust vitality, human skill could not rally nature's forces to overcome the weakening shock, and her mortal form fell into eternal sleep a few minutes before six o'clock on the morning of Tuesday, July 15.

Notwithstanding the withering heat of the afternoon of the 17th inst., friends gathered in such numbers at the last services as to fill the rooms, hall and stairway of 3243 Wabash avenue to overflowing. There were scripture selections and prayer by Rev. Rusk, words of tribute by the president of the Illinois State Association, appropriate selections by quartette and soloist and then members of the Eastern Star rendered the burial ritual of their sisterhood. Near the close of the last named exercise, one of the singers who had been a close friend was unwittingly controlled by the deceased to announce her conscious presence and and voice her thanks for the respect shown to her memory. Rev. Rusk conducted the burial commitment at Oakwoods cemetery.

Besides her grief-bewildered husband, Mrs. Salvator leaves a daughter, Mrs. Jacob Wolf, to agonize for her human presence. Her departure causes a great void in our list of active workers. Her following was a large and loyal one. The attractiveness of her Sunday evening meetings was increased by the homelike atmosphere of her large parlors. They became the Mecca of thoughtful people who shunned the more public halls. None were barred by poverty, condition or nationality.

Let not tears of selfishness or vain regrets, but a noble emulation of her modest fidelity, be the real monument to her memory reared by every loyal friend.

She hath done what she could.

POOR OLD DAD.

Ye kin sca'ce pick up a paper
An' its "poets' corner" greet,
'Cept ye'll see er pirty poem
'Bout the mother, saintly, sweet;
But ye'll have a time a-sarchin'—
Eyes will be er-achin' bad—
Ere ye'll overtake a poem
Writ about the pore ole dad!

No, it isn't willful in 'em—
Them what write of mother dear—
That thar's never notice taken
Of her ole man settin' near;
No, it's never meant to slight him,
But hit looks a little sad—
All the bouquets made for mother,
Not a bloom for pore ole dad!

True, our mother watched above us
Till her dear ole eyes wud ache,
But ole dad, he humped to feed us
Till his back would nearly break,
Mother crooned above the cradle,
Gave devotion all she had;
Still, thar wasn't any circus
All this time for pore ole dad!

Do not take one line from mother
When ye write the soul-sweet song,
But if thar's a word for father
Now and then, it won't be wrong.
Poor ole soul! He's bent and wrinkled
An' I know 'twould make him glad
If, while you are praisin' mother,
Somethin's sed for pore ole dad!

God Is a God of the Living, Not of the Dead.

Reply to Dr. Hirsch

Through the Lips of Mrs. Cora L. V. Richmond.

"God is not the God of the dead but of the living." "I will preach no more funeral sermons."

This was the statement, or this remark, ascribed to Rabbi Hirsch, in a recent utterance, and he adds, "we cannot benefit the dead by funeral discourses. There is nothing in Judaism that teaches immortality."

If this is true, i. e., if it is truly quoted, of course we cannot blame Rabbi Hirsch for not speaking at funerals. No man has any business to speak at funerals who does not believe in a future life.

It is true also, a fact which most of us deplore, that there is undue ostentation and external display at funerals: the long retinue of mourners; the black drapings and trappings of woe. We believe there should be and will be a reform in this direction.

In England the mourning is delegated to hired mourners; the friends do not go to the funerals, the grave. That is rather better, but not quite so sincere.

There are three reasons at the present time for addresses, discourses, or remarks when people pass away from the earth: To the majority of human beings the event is one of great sorrow; a calamity to those left behind, and every one feels the loss. And it is the province of religion, of whatever name or nature, to minister at such an hour. Besides it is a suitable place to pay just tribute to the life and work of the one that has arisen. Oftentimes people wait until the funeral, or until the person has gone before they express their appreciation. We would advise a little more appreciation every day, a little more recognition of each other. Do not be afraid of praising one another, do not be afraid of recognizing each others' gifts, it will not invalidate your good qualities because you recognize those in others. Especially, if you love your friends you cannot love them too much. The time on earth is very short to love them.

Of course, the right kind of religion teaches people that they never cease to love their friends on earth and in heaven. But a little manifestation of it here and now in daily life, in your daily walks would make life more pleasant. But after all, when the casket is there, or when the spirit is released from the body, it is a suitable time to sum up the value of that human life, of what that human life stood for, of the loving deeds and words. Of those who have taken a conspicuous or noted part in the affairs of nations it is a good time to make a landmark, a milestone, and tell what they have done for humanity. This is not the most essential, the second and more essential point is to comfort those who mourn.

No religion is of any value that does not offer comfort at such an hour; and the great surprise of the world must be that throughout Christendom the funeral and the funeral service has been made an occasion of almost inconsolable sorrow. With all the hope and faith that people have in creed and dogma, when death comes it seems an occasion of sorrow. Did people believe, as we believe, that the spirit of Jesus rose triumphantly from the tomb as an illustration of what people will do who believe on him, then would there be any occasion for this sorrow? It is the severing of the human tie, the breaking of the daily and hourly communion and conversation; it is the great veil that lies between you and that realm. So when in the New or Old Testament, the minister or the teacher cannot find the word and the teaching whereby he can comfort the mourner, it seems as though his religion must be empty and void; if he has no words that will assuage this grief, that will, in a measure, enkindle hope, that will uplift and strengthen those who feel for the time being that all the foundations of life have gone from under their feet; the house is empty; everything is changed, human things are not the same. At such an hour people are more receptive to spiritual and religious teaching.

We have nothing to say, however, concerning the religious teacher, so-called, who has no word of comfort at such a time. We are sorry for him. We do not know what business he has to preach, for in both the Old and New Testaments we find any number of passages and chapters that give the greatest hope and strength and encouragement for such a time.

We remember once the Rev. Minot J. Savage was called with your pastor to officiate at a funeral in Boston. He had not then pursued his psychic research investigations; he said to her: "I always feel at such a time as this my utter inability, my weakness to meet the occasion, because I have no knowledge of the future life, as you have."

This was a great confession, a great admission. Rabbi Hirsch has made a similar one publicly. The Rev. Minot J. Savage did not stop with a portion of his creed, however liberal in other directions, he simply said: If there is a way to know about these things, I intend to know them. He joined the Psychical Research Society and investigated the claims of the manifestations of Modern Spiritualism. The Rev. Minot J. Savage is prepared now to speak at funerals, because he knows something about the other world.

Does Rabbi Hirsch claim that all his knowledge of the ethical and philosophical relations of human life were derived from the Mosaic Scriptures? Does he claim that the Jewish religion has given him all the knowledge that he gives forth from his pulpit? If the Jewish religion does not teach about modern science, modern philosophy, modern art, does he never mention these from his pulpit? Many of his sermons are replete with the learning of modern science; many of his sermons are full of modern art and modern philosophy. Did he get this from the Jewish religion? If he did not, has he not the same right to pursue an investigation concerning the future life beyond what Judaism taught?

If it is possible for any minister of any denomination to know more about the future life, or any one outside of denominational lines, has not Rabbi Hirsch the right to know it?

He has just as good right as Rabbi Weil, of Bradford, Pa., who came to Cassadaga to study the phenomena and the philosophy of Spiritualism. He listened to your pastor there several times. He went back to Bradford and told his congregation what he had seen and heard. Some of the elders were about to ask him to resign, but the congregation said, if he resigned they would go too. The result was, that he could preach his thoughts to a certain limit. But then he did not propose to be bound by any limits at all. He then wrote a book (The Religion of the Future) in which he said: Spiritualism is the religion of the future.

This kind of knowledge is precisely what is needed. We have found a more liberal spirit, usually, among the Rabbis of the Hebraic Church than among the ministers of the Christian denominations; an interest in the subject, a desire to know about it. Of course, Rabbi Hirsch knows that this subject is in the world. Why cannot he find out about the future life?

Another singular thing is, that the quotation ascribed to him, is from the New Testament, not from the Old. The Old Testament tells us that God was the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. But it was Jesus who made the application of: "God is not a God of the dead, but of the living;" and it was precisely upon the point that Rabbi Hirsch is professing ignorance upon: i. e., the future life. In the Gospel of Matthew it is called the "resurrection;" and Jesus was talking about the future life and saying that it is not that God is a God of the dead, but of the living; which meant that Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were alive instead of being dead. But no Hebrew puts this interpretation upon it. The Hebrew people never thought that the resurrection was in a spiritual sense. They believed that it was physical, that it related to the earth, that Jerusalem is to be literally restored to them.

Does Rabbi Hirsch claim to be an orthodox Jew? Does he not take an added and more liberal view of all these subjects? Would it not be the right thing for him if he cannot minister to those who mourn, cannot conscientiously give them any knowledge or thought concerning the future life, to study about it from those who know? If he does not want to investigate Spiritualism, let him take Plato or any of the ancient philosophers. If he does not want to investigate phenomena, let him take the poetry, philosophy and romance of every age. Every genius has given to the world thoughts concerning immortality. No philosophy is so barren as to be without it. No poetry is so meager that it has not some suggestions of the larger, immortal life. The highest themes that can engage human thought are those that relate to the nature of the soul and its immortal destiny.

In modern times, in the world to-day, there is a method whereby he can know. Is he ashamed to try it. Did not the Rev. Minot J. Savage try it? Did not the Rev. Heber Newton try it? Have not a score of Christian ministers tried it? These now stand in their pulpits teaching the certainty of a future life, gained by such investigations. What men of science, like Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace and Sir William Crookes, of England, are not ashamed to investigate, what clergymen, like those we have named are not afraid to investigate, the Rev. Rabbi Hirsch should not be afraid to investigate if the great pall of mourning can be lifted from the world. The moment you make people know that their friends are not dead, but living; that they are not far away but near; that they are not waiting and sleeping until the day of the resurrection of the body, but here and now is the resurrection and the new life. "For God is a God of the living." Meaning: that whatever becomes of bodies, souls are alive, spirits are alive.

When Moses and Elias appeared upon the Mount of Transfiguration it was a direct rebuke to the thought that all sleep until their bodies are resurrected.

Let us consider that this life, of which Rabbi Hirsch says he is ignorant, is continually impinging upon human existence, and has given the best inspirations to the Rabbis of the Hebrew Church, has awakened the songs of prophets, the psalms of David, has visited Isaiah and filled the ancient books of record in the Old Testament. Let us consider that if we take away the ministrations of angels and spirits from the Bible we take away the only part of it that makes it valuable. That in the one hundred or more instances in which the "Angel of the Lord" appears to different prophets he appears in the guise of the arisen human spirit. These angels did not claim to be a separate order of beings. They spoke with the tongue and knowledge of the men whom they visited, and they walked on earth as men in those days. And that you may know that they are those that have lived on earth, the prophets declared that they could appear again.

This question of immortality is the vital question of life. The agnostic, the materialist, the Second Adventist and Jews teach that whatever relates to this life is the most important. That if you obey the Hebraic or other laws of the church; that if you follow the Commandments and attend to the affairs of human life you may or may not be resurrected.

But if it shall be borne in upon, or if it shall be awakened from, the consciousness of Rabbi Hirsch that this proposition of immortality is innate; that it relates to all souls; that all people have a right to know about it; that the time they most need it (the hour of sorrow) is the time they have a right to know about it, and if he cannot say from his own knowledge, he can read from the Jewish passages of the Scriptures, he can read from the standard poets, from the philosophies of Plato and Socrates and their modern successors, from the intuition and learning that the world has given, he can cross over to India and Arabia and seek this knowledge of immortality there, he can bring it from India and show that the life that Buddha taught is eternal, he can take it from the book of nature; that which shows that every form of life is from the source or spirit of life forever, or he can by visitations and investigations in the right direction receive the direct testimony, the knowledge that appeals to the human understanding, of the visitations of the spirits of the "departed," as they are called, unto human beings; he can show that this veil has been removed, he can say, as several ministers have said to the mourners when called upon to officiate with us at funerals: "The spirit of your departed friend is with you now, is here in your midst and is as much a part of your life as before."

Nothing prevents any human being from knowing this, excepting intellectual or spiritual bigotry. The agnostics and materialists and some classes of people are intellectual bigots; there are many religious bigots. Those who are too bigoted to seek knowledge of the immortal life, of course, are not in a condition to be comforted, strengthened and encouraged by that knowledge.

But see how changed the accompaniments of funerals are: upon the door of the house of the departed one, instead of hangings of crape you see garlands of flowers; the casket is no longer covered with somber drapery, but blossoms, testimony of loving friends, fill the room and cover the casket, as if to rebuke at that hour any undue grief and to point to this immortal life, words of comfort borne from the great influx of spirit life in the 19th and 20th centuries is poured out at such a time.

Many a minister has been glad that Spiritualism is in the world! Not because he claims to believe in it, but because he can take that which it teaches to comfort the mourners, to give them an assurance of a future life, to wipe the tears away from the eyes of the suffering, to make a different basis of life for those who remain.

Friends, it is a startling thing when a man can say in the midst of any religious congregation, "I have nothing to offer concerning immortality." It is a startling thing even coming from outside the church among the materialists and agnostics. Yet we do not believe that there is actually a materialist in the world, that is, one who totally rejects the thought of a future existence. We have often referred to the testimony of the great agnostic, Robert Ingersoll, when he stood beside the casket that contained the body of his brother, and with the loving tribute and eloquent remarks, he said: "We hope to meet again."

Does not Judaism contain as much hope as materialism and agnosticism? If it does not people would be better to leave it. That which has the most hope for the world is the best to cling to; that which contains the most knowledge is the best to attain. And we assure you, beloved friends, that this great "cloud of witnesses" that encompass you around about, and this constant perception by intuition and impression of invisible presences are accompanied also by the added testimony of distinct messages, and that hundreds of people, sensitive and active in this realm are giving those messages. That it is as much a legitimate method of communion as sending a message across the Atlantic by cable, or to New York by telephone or telegraph. When this method of communion is once open to you the great void is filled, the great pang is forgotten, the House of Life is open to you, it has larger and more open chambers, you have entered into the knowledge that this earth life is but the basement or first story of this human spiritual habitation. These other "mansions" or other rooms in the great dwelling place of life are never seen by human vision, because of the lack of perception. There are millions of living things on the earth that you cannot see, they are too small, and there are millions of things which are too large for you to see in the realm of nature, but you know they are there. So this added knowledge of the other realm, this inter-communion that is possible, this great strengthening life is within.

Rabbi Hirsch should take lessons from the great masters of human thought, not one of whom has been a materialist, not one of whom has doubted a future life, and all of whom in their philosophy and in their teachings have given the fundamental principles upon which man's immortality is based, and have pointed to the intuitions, strengthened by inspiration and revelation, to show that the future life is a reality.

Of what avail is this transient human existence? Of what avail the upbuilding of structures and the gathering together of earthly treasures? Of what avail the affections if they are to be buried and blotted out in death?

The star-eyed Prophetess of Inspiration, the calm-browed Goddess of Immortality over and within human souls make manifest unto human lives, according to their needs, that future existence.

If Rabbi Hirsch studied at this shrine, or was a worshiper of the religion that includes immortality, he would find abundant evidence without, and absolute evidence from within.

THE SPIRITUAL SIGNIFICANCE.

A VERY IMPORTANT WORK.

The Spiritual Significance is by Lilian Whiting, author of "The World Beautiful," "After Her Death," "Kate Field, A Record," "A Study of Elizabeth Barrett Browning." Cloth, $1.00.

Miss Whiting finds the title of her new book in these lines from "Aurora Leigh:"

"If a man could feel
Not one, but every day, feast, fast, and working-day,
The spiritual significance burn through
The hieroglyphic of material shows,
Henceforward he would paint the globe with wings."

The aim of this book is to reveal the curiously close correspondence between the developments of modern science and spiritual laws; to note that new forces, as discovered and applied in wireless telegraphy, are simply laws of an unseen realm into which humanity is rapidly advancing and thus gaining a new environment. From this evolutionary progress, as illustrated by physical science the author of "The World Beautiful" continues the same argument presented in those volumes in a plea that the future life is the continuation and development of our present life in all its faculties and powers, and that the present may be ennobled by the constant sense of the Divine Presence, and a truer knowledge of the nature of man and his relations to God tend to a higher morality and increasing happiness. The book is characterized by the same essential style and qualities that have insured for "The World Beautiful" volumes an almost world-wide popularity.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM.

It Embraces Whatever Is Worthy in Every System.

NUMBER SIXTEEN.

Hypnotism.

No definite and unyielding line can be drawn indicating where ordinary action of mind upon mind becomes "mesmeric," and we may say the difference is in degree of subjectivity and assertion; yet there is an appreciable distinction. As in other fields we draw no inflexible line between use and abuse (conditions qualifying) but the general proposition is sound that no person is justified under ordinary conditions to habitually negative or control the will of another, and it is the spirit of tyranny and oppression that tempts to this subjugation.

In the hands of the arrogant, the presumptuous, the unscrupulous hypnotism is diabolism—"black magic." If you love your own soul you will not under ordinary conditions assume control of one with whom you do not thoroughly sympathize, for apart from the injury you do that person you will be in the position of the man who had hold of a bull's tail, needing help to let go; and if you have any intuitive perception of character you will not let any one whom you do not feel strongly attracted to assume control of you. "Obsession," when not of the imagination (lunacy), is simply habitual control by unscrupulous and unsympathetic spirits.

The quality of personal magnetism varies as anything else, even as there are qualities of butter, tea or wine. Some who are healthy and strongly magnetic, yet because of what we may term the coarse quality of their aura, instead of being "developers" exert an influence opposed to spirit manifestations. Refined spirits cannot work in their magnetism. After it became known that some sensitives were taken by spirits from the control of mesmerists and particularly after the experience of Andrew Jackson Davis, every Tom, Dick and Harry conscious of hypnotic power assumed that to unlock the door of all spirit mysteries was that he get control of a sensitive. Many of these exhibitions were abhorrent to sympathetic souls, often a coarse, unscrupulous bear of a man controlling a delicate sensitive girl. A clodhopper with horny hands and crowbar tuning a piano. Many of these "developers" are very inspirational, and others, as one confessed to me, dare not "sit" himself because what he considered the lowest order of spirits came to him, yet he was ambitious to be a hypnotist and developer—to make negative and hand into control of spirits refined women and little children.

Yet "laying on of hands" for to bestow the "gift of the holy spirit" in scriptural days was essentially what we now refer to as magnetizing a person to assist in development, and all honor to those who are intelligent enough, considerate enough, sympathetic enough and sensitive enough themselves to know when to act and when to refrain. For this is certain, that immeasurable good is done by those qualified; the ordinary man or woman being too assertive, too positive, too stubborn and unresponsive under ordinary conditions for intercourse with delicate, responsive spirits.

Again: As a healer can by getting you in a subjective condition the more effectively charge you with his healthy aura, so can the unscrupulous draw from you in this passive condition, and whether done by spirits incarnate or decarnate this constitutes vampirism when persisted in. In society and business circles under existing conditions there is a great deal of what borders on or is vampirism. There is exchange of magnetism in every social relation, and the Irishman in his famous "give and take" is the true social philosopher, providing all parties are equally free and a fraternal spirit dominates. The child draws from the mother, but there is no vampirism even when there is hardly any return because love rules in the distribution, and this obedience to Love, "the great leveler," is what distinguishes white from black magic—vampirism from a heavenly relationship. Whenever and wherever the natural affections and emotions are repressed, as often in business, or whenever and wherever they are unnaturally excited, as in religious revivals sometimes, there is vampirism—the strong despoiling the weak.

NUMBER SEVENTEEN.

Social Reform.

The first effort of the early Christians after being "endowed with power from on high" was to found a social commonwealth on the principle "From every one according to his ability; to every one according to his needs." The happy family exhibits here and there on earth the nearest realization of an ideal state, and there this principle is always acknowledged. No preying of the strong upon the weak. No devising sophistical reasons why the weak should be pushed to the wall because they are unworthy. An utter repudiation of

"the simple plan
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can."

A generous avowal of the principle, broadly, that the worthy are those in need if they can appreciate in all things, as the hungry are those who should eat if they can digest. And as the sensation of hunger is generally assurance of digestive ability, so is the craving for other comforts indication of appreciative capacity. Don't be too exacting that the savage learn all the rules of etiquette before he sleeps in a spring bed. Your ancestor was a savage, and although they are too considerate to call you a savage, you need favors from those far more refined and intelligent than yourself.

Paul, exalted into the "third heaven," found himself so naturally affected that whether in the physical body or not he could hardly say. Reason says tests this law, so far is it to be considered that it should be so to one spiritually developed, and revelation, the general testimony of spirits, coincides with that of Paul. It is then in the social regulations of a heavenly state we must look for the momentous difference between life there and in a state where is branded in hard lines on so many faces the sad enigma—"Is life worth living?"

(The question had never been so much discussed in periodicals that gauge well the popular demand, if it were not doubtful.)

It is customary at Christmas time for the bright ones of literature to extol with fact and fancy a civilization which in name acknowledges Jesus as the ideal man. Last Christmas a noted editor published what was copied by other periodicals as a gem. After a beautiful eulogy of our civilization and of the character of Jesus, he yet confessed that in the savage industrial struggle to-day, if a man falls he had better die than ask mercy of his fellow-man.

The last time I was in church was on Christmas. This is part of the hymn triumphant (?) Christians sang:

"Beneath those angel strains have rolled
Two thousand years of wrong."

Yet for the greater part of that two thousand years a system supposed to rest on the ethical ideas of Jesus and styled Christianity has been imposed by every means calculated to impress the human mind. The fondest hopes and direst fears aroused; every argument used that reason or sophistry could devise; the most terrible gods and devils invoked; whatever means could lure the will or terrify the imagination into a sanction of this system; whenever they could one division after another appealing to social ostracism, to the fagot and the rack; and to-day, as Mr. Dooley observes, "the clargy are not a block from the Inquisition."

Not long ago I read what was curious because coming from a D. D., the statement of a belief that future ages will read of the social and economic life of to-day with an abhorrence such as we have for cannibalism. Spencer says the student of another day will learn with wonder that there ever existed a state of society in which one man enjoyed without labor, at the expense of thousands who labored without enjoying. Tolstoi says, now if ever is mankind divided into two classes—slaves and masters, only the slavery is more ingenious and sometimes more exacting than chattel slavery. Carlyle in his bombastic way says, "Can such things endure? No, by the soul that is in man they cannot and they will not and they shall not."

So there may be heard a chord of sadness, of discontent, of rebellion in the strain of all who stand upon the peaks of thought as sentinels of the towers, catching sometimes consciously and sometimes unconsciously suggestions from the messengers of another and better world; assurance that the angels are intensely interested in a social reform on earth. A little child attracted back by the strong mother love says, "Oh, mamma, how can you stay in such a sad world?"

And the sensitive to-day after a good spiritual exaltation, "coming down from the mount" and realizing the cruelties and oppressions practiced in the name of God and of Jesus will feel out of place, and like those of old confess himself "a stranger and a pilgrim on the earth." Have you ever gone into a poor lodging-house, so tired you could sleep anywhere; rise up in the morning and go out into the pure air and sunlight; then return to that room and wonder how you could ever have reposed in such a stuffy, ill-smelling place? Just so does a spirit, on returning to earth from a celestial abode, wonder how he ever sanctioned or was satisfied with our social conditions.

NUMBER EIGHTEEN.

Magnetic Attraction.

We now undertake to discuss the most important communication that ever was or ever will be given to mortals from above.

As "dirt is dust in the wrong place;" as a note out of place will produce musical discord, so is a bad man or evil spirit one out of his true place in the social scale—out of the natural orbit of his magnetic attraction. A dog with the sense of smell will prove that your emanations differ from those of any other person. Some sensitives claim to see this "aura," and that it has a distinct shade as smell is easy of belief. Now as one color blends with another to produce a harmonious whole, or as one tone harmonizes with another to produce good music, so will your magnetism blend with that of some people to produce social happiness, or forced to mingle with that of others results in discord, strife and disease; and any government which by religious, social, or economic laws forces you into close association with uncongenial natures signs its own death warrant. To a degree we can isolate ourselves and as an electrician handles a live wire with rubber gloves, so can we handle an uncongenial fellow—converse with, labor with, etc.—but only to a degree and never long sustained.

It is not frequently a question of the magnetism being healthy or unhealthy, good or bad, any more than one note or one color is good and another bad, although there is always the question of refinement. It is simply a question of fitness. Because of a magnetic quality that indicates temperament, talents and defects, powers and needs, I naturally attract some, am indifferent to others, and repel others from intimacy. This is the law of spiritual affinity—the law of love, and "God is Love," nor will you realize the heavenly life in this or any other world until you become a member of a social fraternity which gives honorable and unequivocal recognition to this only social law that regulates the intercourse of purified souls in heaven.

He is a good man on earth who best acknowledges this law, and a bad man who ignores it. He is "dead in trespasses and in sins." Your Spiritualism itself must stand or fall by this criterion, and so far as it violates in the production of phenomena or giving of demned. And if there ever was or will be "spirits of devils working miracles," it will be manifest by a disregard of this law. So while people seek instruction regarding the spirit life, that sublime essay of Paul shall endure:

"Though I have all gifts and understand all mysteries, etc., if I have not love it profiteth me nothing."

The old hymn says of a portion of this earth,

"Where every prospect pleases
And only man is vile."

It is partially true in so far as man alone in the pride of a half-developed intellect, and moved by a lust for power over other men, has endeavored to ignore, annul, and substitute for this everlasting law artificial, unnatural and abortive conceits. This is the law which so far as they are gifted moves the beasts of the field and fowls of the air to wisely choose their associates, guides the flowers of the field and even the mineral to declare affinity and repulsion. To say that man is not susceptible and amenable is to confess that he is "duller than the fat weed that rots itself at ease on Lethe wharf"—duller than "the clod which the rude swain turns with his shear and treads upon." This is the law a transgression of which is forgiven neither in this life nor that which is to come, but in any life in any world, is followed by misery, disorganization, disintegration. In the dull phlegmatic man action is slower, but results are sure. In spiritual development the first effect is a quickening of the sensorium to this subtle attraction, and the higher you soar—the more you develop the more imperative that you honor this law which is the voice of the "living God," the divinity that dwells within you all.

It will "lead you in ways you have not known." It was this moved Jesus in his unconventional dealing with Mary Magdalene and the thief on the cross; that guided him in choosing twelve intimates irrespective of social standing out of a million, and out of that twelve to choose one whom the others referred to as "that disciple whom Jesus loved."

Those whom I here attract are frequently held in the coils of mammon or fashion, hindered by poverty or intimidated by religious or quasi-religious obligations from responding to this spiritual law which is older, deeper, wiser than any religion or priest. There is gradual change going on, and you may attract to-day those you repelled last year, but always you naturally draw those who are strong where you are weak, or weak where you are strong, and there is a mutual rounding out and stimulating into action the dormant qualities. There can be no real satisfaction in mediumship when this law of affinities is repudiated, and there is this guarantee that spirits will not be so easily tempted as we to dishonor it—the assurance that a violation by them is visited by more swift punishment. Reaction is slower—impeded by the flesh. Let no one who is humble and considerate fear to look through the veil, for those who love you most have under fair, ordinary conditions a hundred fold advantage in coming to you.

"Love rules the camp, the court, the grove."

THE GOOD TIME NOW.

The world is strong with mighty hope
Of a good time yet to be,
And carefully casts the horoscope
Of her future destiny;
And poet and prophet and priest, and sage,
Are watching with anxious eyes,
To see the light of promised age
On the waiting world arise.
O, weary and long seems that time to some,
Who under life's burdens bow,
For while they wait for that time to come,
They forget 'tis a good time now.

The world rests not, with a careless ease,
On the wisdom of the past—
From Moses, and Plato and Socrates,
It is onward advancing fast;
And the words of Jesus, and John, and Paul,
Stand out from the lettered page,
And the living present contains them all
In the spirit that moves the age.
Great, earnest souls, through the truth made free,
No longer in blindness bow,
And the good time coming, the yet to be
Has begun with the good time now.

Then up! nor wait for the promised hour,
For the good time now is best;
And the soul that uses its gift of power
Shall be in the present blest.
Whatever the future may have in store,
With a will there is ever a way;
And none need burden the soul with more
Than the duties of to-day.
Then up! with a spirit brave and free,
And put the hand to the plow,
Nor wait for the good time yet to be,
But work for the good time now.

Dr. Lyman Abbott and Individual Rights.

In his speech before the Reform Club, a few evenings ago, the Rev. Lyman Abbott declared:

"What I stand for to-night is the right of the people of New York to decide for themselves whether the saloons shall be open on Sunday or not, and the right of the individual to decide for himself what is right. The proposition to open the saloon will array against it practically the whole of the clergy in the first place, and, secondly, the whole of the better women of the state, but let us not forget that we have a theory of government to advance."

Also let us not forget that the keynote of Dr. Abbott's opposition to woman suffrage on which he harps continually, is that "suffrage is not a right," but here he demands the right of the people, the right of the individual to decide the question for themselves. But what sort of a right is it that they are to exercise—fire, sword, gun and fists? Certainly not, but only the right of the suffrage. And "the whole of the good women of the state," are they to exercise this right also? Oh, no, for suffrage is not a right!—Ida Husted Harper in New York Sun.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

Moses and Mattie E. Hull can be addressed until July 28 at Wonewoc, Wis.; From August 1 to 11, at Lake Pleasant, Mass.; August 12 to 31, Waukesha, Wis. After September 7, Whitewater, Wis.

The Spiritualists' tent meeting at State Square, Des Moines, Iowa, will begin to-morrow evening at 8 o'clock sharp. The meetings will continue till the 17th of July, and will be conducted by G. W. Kates and wife, two of the most noted workers in the Spiritualist ranks. At the conclusion of each lecture, Mrs. Kates will demonstrate spirit return by giving spirit messages to persons in the audience who are perfect strangers to the medium. No admission fee, but free offering to aid the National Association will be asked for at the end of the lecture.—Des Moines Capital.

An eminent public man of England whose mental faculties had been subjected to too great a strain and who suffered greatly from mental depression that amounted almost to the disease of melancholia, was told by his physician that he must rest his brain. He was a very busy man and scoffed at his doctor's prescription of a nap in the middle of the day. Finally, after much persuasion, he agreed to this experiment: He would sit in his easy chair every afternoon with his hands on his knees, holding a dinner-bell in his hands. If he lost consciousness and went to sleep he would be willing to sleep for the period that it took for the dinner-bell to fall to the floor and wake him. The doctor who suggested this arrangement declared that the mere mental relaxation of going to sleep, if only for a few seconds, would suffice to save him. He invited his patient to study the activity of the brain by noticing how many things he could dream while the dinner-bell was falling to the floor. Every day for many months the man sat down after luncheon with the dinner-bell in his hands. Every day he went to sleep, slept for half a second, while the bell fell to the floor, and his mental condition improved steadily, partly because of the rest which his mind got through losing consciousness for a second and partly because of his interest in the extraordinary dreams which passed through his brain while the bell was falling.

C. H. Morrison writes: "I find more satisfaction in reading The Progressive Thinker than I do in reading all the other papers published. It has more forcible, strong-minded men and women contributing for its columns than are found back of any other paper. My best wishes go out for the prosperity of it. Every family in this land should take a copy."

The Sleeping Preacher, Mr. Perry, is attracting a great deal of attention. His sermons are grammatical and logical, and takes from forty-five minutes to one hour in delivery of each. Sometimes during the delivery of a sermon the muscles of the body, especially the arms and neck, contract, producing a cataleptic condition. This stops the sermon. The attack lasts a minute or two and are driven away by his wife, who strokes with her hands the parts affected. When the tendency to catalepsy is banished he resumes his discourse beginning exactly where he left off, even though it was in the middle of a sentence. He is simply a trance medium.

Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley regrets to announce she has returned to Mt. Pleasant Park, Clinton, Iowa, on account of illness, thereby being compelled to cancel her engagement at Briggs Park Camp, Mich., to which place she was en route. She hopes to have fully recovered in time to open her next engagement, which is at Clinton Camp, July 20.

Mrs. Geo. W. Quinn, secretary, writes from Dallas, Texas: "Again the Spiritualists of Dallas have awakened to new life with a determination to make every effort to make a success of their work. On June 23 the Spiritualists of Dallas organized the 'Truth Seekers' Spiritualist Society.' Mrs. Georgia G. Cooley, a medium highly endorsed by the N. S. A. of the State of Texas, was present and assisted in the organization. June 29, Mrs. Laura B. Payne, who is a missionary of the State, organized the Lyceum, giving much information, encouragement and advice for the cause, which was highly appreciated. Words of welcome and a vote of thanks was tendered her for being with us. She remained with us ten days, and during the time she gave several lectures, the subjects of which were delivered in a most earnest, intellectual and eloquent manner. Her solos were skillfully rendered and added great pleasure to the services. Briefly speaking, she won by her pleasing manners all who were fortunate in listening to her. The only cause for regret is her stay was not of longer duration."

Dr. F. E. Abbott says that religion is man's effort to perfect himself....Spiritualism, through its phenomena and its inexorable logic, has proved that man survives the changes called death. Having survived the grave, it leads man to think of his future destiny, and teaches him the steps by which he can find his soul....The sincere sympathy of her thousands of friends will go out to the well-known medium, Miss Margaret Gaule, in her recent bereavement—the transition of her venerable mother. The departure of the loved one has cast a shadow of gloom over all of her household, yet it is a blessed release to her spirit.....It is with sincere pleasure that we are able to report that Mrs. May S. Pepper, the distinguished psychic, is more than holding her own with her broken arm. She expects to fill all of her summer engagements from this time, provided no new complications set in to keep her from doing so....Beginning with the July number, "The Lyceum Banner," of London, Eng., hitherto edited and published by J. J. and Miss Florence Morse, will be under the control of Mr. Alfred Kitson as editor and publisher....We are glad to hear that Onset is to have the benefit of the mediumistic service of Mrs. Nettie Merrow, of Maine, who has such an excellent record at the Maine camps, and is most favorably known by the editor.—Banner of Light.

The Cory (Pa.) Journal has the following: "A large audience assembled at the Armory Sunday morning to hear Mrs. Richmond. R. F. Livermore, who presided, announced that she would answer any proper question which the audience might desire to ask, after which she would address them on a subject of their own choosing. Several questions were propounded, among which were the following: 'Is annihilation of the soul or spirit possible?' The answer was to the effect that what is immortal cannot be destroyed and that the spirit is the only immortal thing. To the question as to whether God had set apart a Sabbath or day of rest, she said that every day in the week had been observed by some nation as a day of rest. Rest from labor is a natural law. She thought such observance a useful practice. Nature has periods of rest. After the long season of growth and harvest comes the period of rest and recuperation. Such periods are as needful to man as to nature, and often the times of apparent rest and inactivity are the periods when the forces are gathering strength for greater future action. The question as to whether the soul is an entity or a part of the great First Cause was, by a vote of the audience, taken as the subject of the address, upon which Mrs. Richmond spoke most appropriately, thoughtfully and beautifully for three-quarters of an hour. Her main thoughts were: that the soul is like unto God but is not a part of God; that creation has reference to the point of contact of the soul with matter, that the body is an instrument of manifestation just as the piano or locomotive is the instrument of manifestation to the musician or engineer; that in as much as two finites do not make an infinite, therefore all the souls in the universe cannot flow together to make the infinite; that God is not an experimenter and there would be no value in a spark of the infinite seeking expression through matter only to return and become merged again in the infinite. Mrs. Richmond is a most gifted woman. Her power of expression is remarkable, and her voice and manner are such as to render it a pleasure to listen to her."

Sarah Williamson writes as follows: "Please announce the serious illness of Prof. J. Jay Watson, at his home in Boston, 180 Columbus avenue. He has been ill for three months. He has been carefully nursed by his devoted daughter, Miss Annie Watson. All who know and love these beautiful artists will grieve." We regret to learn of the serious illness of Professor Watson, and earnestly hope that he will soon recover.

Mrs. I. Hill was in the city last week, visiting friends. She resides at Decatur, Ill., and is an excellent medium.

Mrs. W. H. Duree writes from San Diego, Cal.: "Expose fake mediums every time. It is the only way to be true to our spirit friends, and ourselves. Any one who is a Spiritualist and does not so avow is a canard. Another thing some mediums do, is to go to a place, stay a while, get a good lot of money, start development classes, then on the pretext of filling an engagement, go somewhere else, and promise to be back at a certain time, to go on with their work, but never come, nor inform their class (nor friends who have done so much for them) of their change of mind. We had just such a trick served on us here recently by parties from Los Angeles."

The Register and Leader, of Des Moines, Iowa, says: "As the result of the interest aroused in the tenets of Spiritualism at the Spiritualist tent meetings held at State Square, an attempt will be made to-night to form a local association. The meetings have been conducted for several evenings by Mr. and Mrs. G. W. Kates and will continue until July 17. Monday night will be organization night and it is expected a strong local organization will be formed. It will be affiliated with the National Spiritualists Association, under which Mr. and Mrs. Kates are conducting meetings and delivering lectures and spirit messages. A large number visited the tent at State Square in East Des Moines last night and listened with interest to the missionary efforts of Mr. Kates and the expositions of Mrs. Kates as a medium. For twenty minutes Mrs. Kates did a vigorous and accomplished line of work in the way of 'seein' things,' and revealed hidden history concerning the lives of some of her audience that proved highly entertaining. Mr. Kates lectured on 'Psychometry,' and there was a programme of prayer and song as a prelude to the lecture and the delivery of the spirit messages."

In regard to the death of Mrs. Edith L. Ellis, killed almost instantly in a runaway accident, a Cairo (Ill.) paper says: "Mrs. Ellis was one of the most deservedly popular women in Cairo. Her natural accomplishments, her musical and literary abilities, her willingness to aid in any good work; her self-sacrificing devotion to her friends and her sweet disposition endeared her to the whole community. Not alone to those who knew her best, but to all who knew of her. She was born and reared in Cairo; a graduate of the high school, in the class of 1882, but being devoted to music she finished her education under some of the best teachers in America, and was recognized as one of the most efficient pianists in the state. Her age was about thirty-eight years."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

The Christian Spiritualist Society, a newly organized congregation in Buffalo, N. Y., has secured the old Friends' Meeting House, at the corner of Allen and Park streets, and will use it here after as its church. The building is being thoroughly renovated, papered and carpeted and will be ready for occupancy by next Sunday. The new society has grown to its present proportions under the pastorate of F. O. Williams, who came here last September. The new pastor comes from a church in Brooklyn, where he labored for seven years, and of which the Hon. A. H. Dally, the Surrogate Judge of Brooklyn, was president.

Harry J. Moore, a rising young man, and a great favorite with the South Side Society of this city, is now temporarily in Rochester, Ind., where he can be addressed for the present in care of the General Delivery. He will be at the Briggs Park Camp on July 31, and August 1, 2 and 3.

Dr. W. M. Forster writes from San Francisco, Cal.: "I have arrived in California again, and have opened permanent offices in San Francisco, at 118 and 119 St. Ann's Building. I am again in most excellent health and spirits, and suffer very little from my injured leg. I had intended staying in New Mexico or Colorado until the end of the year, but I have had such pressure brought to bear that I felt compelled to resume practice in San Francisco again. I come to my work 'like a giant refreshed with new wine,' having added much to my experience of men and things during the past few months."

At a cabinet meeting held at the Elysee palace, Paris, France, President Loubet signed a decree closing the religious institutions which have not complied with the provisions of the law of associations. One hundred and thirty establishments are involved. Instructions on the subject were sent to the various prefectures. These religious institutions are continually plotting against the government.

Correspondent writes from Lynn, Mass.: "Very successful meetings are being held every Sunday by the Lynn Spiritualists Association at Unity Camp, Saugus Center. Good audiences have been in attendance since the beginning of the season and an unusually large one on July 13, the occasion being a benefit to the building fund by Mrs. May S. Pepper, who was at her very best in the excellence of her work, although suffering still from the effects of spraining her arm a few weeks ago. Mrs. Pepper is truly a wonderful medium; she grows better each season. Others participating in the meeting were Mrs. Sarah Byrnes, Dr. Hale, Mr. Emerson, Mr. Sears, Mrs. Nutter, Mrs. Albert Lewis and Madame Helyett. These meetings are conducted by Alex Caird, M. D., president of the society; good music, both vocal and instrumental. Good speakers and mediums are present every Sunday, and refreshments can be procured in the grove. The public is cordially invited to come and spend the day. The meetings are free. The Social Union connected with the society (Mrs. Dr. Caird, president,) holds a test seance in the grove every Wednesday afternoon. July 30 a gypsy camp will be held, at which private readings will be given by many first-class mediums."

G. E. Chesbro writes from Los Angeles, Cal.: "The trial of our case which was set for July 10, came off yesterday in the Superior Court before a jury, Judge Smith presiding. The charge to the jury was grand, and wholly in our favor as one might expect from the opinion handed down in his ruling on the appeal from the lower court. Great was the surprise and consternation of every one who heard the trial and the charge to the jury, when it was learned that the jury declared it impossible for them to agree. So the judge late last evening dismissed the jury from further service in this case, and we were informed that the matter stood exactly as before the trial."

During the burning of the Baldwin Hotel, near our office, says Human Nature, of San Francisco, a man was seen to lift up a window in the third story, as if about to jump out to the street below. He was rescued by a brave fireman. A few days later, when asked about the state of his mind in the face of death, he replied that as for his own soul and body he had little or no fear, but he was greatly agitated about his invalid wife in Chicago, and prayed earnestly that if he became a victim of the fire his son would care for the family. He then drew from his pocket a letter he had received from his son, stating that he had just awakened from a fearful dream in which he saw his father leap from a burning building. The letter was written in Chicago on the morning of the fire in San Francisco, before the news could be published in Chicago for their morning papers were issued when the hotel caught fire. The question was asked the traveling man how he accounted for his son's fearful dream. He replied that he could not say, unless his own agitation had affected his boy, who was very sympathetic, and to whom he was deeply attached. Is not this a clear case of Telepathy? Was it an act of the self-conscious brain? We think so. The dream and the reality were more than a mere coincidence.

Lenox writes from Port Huron, Mich.: "Once more have we been blessed by the spirit world through the mediumship of Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie, of San Francisco, Cal. While visiting friends in the city she gave two lectures, morning and evening, Sunday, July 6, and although the weather was warm, society hall was filled with people who were pleased to again hear her. On the 9th the beautiful home of Mr. and Mrs. Kenwick was filled with friends of Mrs. Gillespie, who crowned her with white roses, queen of the evening, and all were surprised when the doors of the dining-room were thrown open at the display of flowers. The walls were one solid bank of foliage and flowers, while in the center of the table stood a cross three feet high, made of Rambler roses, red and white. All had a good time and hope for an early repetition of the same."

Dr. E. T. Spencer writes from Riverton, Neb.: "I desire to write a few lines in reference to the mediumship of my daughter, whose obituary I enclose. She had been a physical sufferer for years, and had to leave her mountain home last fall on account of the altitude affecting her heart. The first of her mediumship when a child ten years old, was manifested one morning when she informed us that her grandfather, 600 miles away, had passed to spirit life. We did not know that he was sick. She also told us some things he said at the time of departure. In two days we received a letter that he had passed away as she said, and in a few days a letter from her grandmother, verifying her statement as to what he said at the time. I consider this remarkable from a child so young, but her life was full of many such things. Without asking or receiving a cent she has convinced many of the continuity of life."

An Outrage.—Thomas J. Shelton's Mental Science paper, called the Christian, has been refused second-class rates by the postoffice department. The editor has had to pay one cent on each copy for postage ever since the year began. This has taken his savings for the past seven years. A weekly issue is now impossible. He cannot afford to pay for postage more than one-half of the total receipts for subscription; it will therefore be issued monthly hereafter, when the postage will be only 12 cents a year instead of 52 cents, as now demanded. His paper is as fully entitled to pound rates as any one in existence, and to refuse such is unreasonable and unjust. The only reason given is that Mr. Shelton, its editor, is a "mental healer." It is a blow aimed at New Thought, but it will rebound upon the heads of its would-be destroyers.—Philosophical Journal.

The spiritual camp-meeting and Chautauqua at South Boulder Canon, Col., opened on July 4 in a manner which was highly pleasing. Many visitors were present and enjoyed the first day at the camp. The camp is one of the pleasantest resorts in the great Rocky Mountain region. Rev. W. E. Mansfield, the manager of the camp, is using every effort to make this the best meeting ever held in the Middle West, and arrangements have been made with many of the most prominent spirit speakers of the country for lectures at various times. The camp will each day be entertained by a varied program, consisting of seances, lectures, Indian camp-fires and addresses by prominent mediums. Those wishing to attend may take the Colorado & Southern railroad to Marshall. The fare for the round trip is 90 cents, provided an order is procured from the manager, Rev. W. E. Mansfield. Denver (Col.) Times.

Correspondent writes: "Commencing next fall the Rev. Lundeberg will hold regular Spiritualist services here in Chicago in a public hall every Sunday. His first lecture will treat on the subject already mentioned in a previous issue of The Progressive Thinker. Some years ago he was a Unitarian minister; later he became a convert to Roman Catholicism, and now stands on a free platform. He is by birth a Swede, but will conduct his services in the English language. A Biographical Dictionary has the following about him: 'Axel Lundeberg, clergyman; received a college education in Upsala, Sweden; studied at the University of Leipzig, Germany, from 1877 to 1880, and at the University of Upsala, Sweden, from 1880 to 1884. Mr. Lundeberg has visited Germany, France, Switzerland, Italy, England, and other European countries. Since he came here he has traveled all over the country, especially in the Northwest and on the Pacific coast. In 1890 he settled in Minneapolis, Minn., and organized the first Swedish Unitarian Church in the United States. He has published several pamphlets, most of them being of a religious nature, and has a reputation as a writer of more than ordinary ability. He is considered to be one of the best educated Swedish-Americans.' In one of his lectures he will tell how he became a Spiritualist. He thinks the Scandinavian branch of the Teutonic race, which produced such seers as, for instance, St. Birgitta and Emanuel Swedenborg, and philosophers like Chr. Bostrom, Victor Rydberg and Pontus Wikner, not to speak about the Eddas and other religious works, in spirituality and intuition rival the Hindoos, and might be destined to play an important part in the development and evolvement of the religion of the future. The location of the hall will be announced later, and all will be welcome to attend."

W. J. Colville will spend next winter on the Pacific coast.

An American paper, "The Christian Advocate," tells a good story about Frank Stockton, concerning the disadvantages of "going to heaven," and the more satisfactory experiment of going to—elsewhere. Mr. Stockton was at a reception where each guest was expected to tell a story of some sort; and, when it came to his turn, he gravely told the experiences of a scientist who went to heaven, and was bored. Everything was settled there; and there seemed nothing to grapple with and nothing useful to do. There was no room for invention, no scope for the scientific spirit. After a time his restlessness increased, and he made a petition to the authorities that he might visit the other regions. He went, and at once found excellent opportunities for experiment, for introducing improvements, and for mitigating misery. Finally, he determined to remain; and laid out work that appeared to need millions of years. We are disposed to think that the insight of this is at least as marked as the humor.—Light, London, Eng.

A. R. C. writes: "There are two kinds of Spiritualism, the good and bad. We can very soon tell what kind is among us. When we are happy and cheerful, and the world looks bright, and we are ready to forgive all wrongs, we know the good spirits are near. When we feel spiteful or wicked, we can know bad spirits are among us. As we are drifting along the pathway of life, if we meet with persons who are in the habit of frequenting saloons and places of questionable resorts, we know they are influenced by bad spirits, and unless we can show them their error, we should shun them, even as we would the poisonous vipers that infest the earth; for the vipers can only poison the body while the bad influences poison the soul. If Spiritualism should prove nothing but a belief, it is far better than the orthodox religion for it robs death of its sting and the grave of its victory. Thoughts are things; they are sent out into space; they bound on and on until they strike somewhere to bring weal or woe."

C. writes: "July 13 was an ideal day in the woods for the Pittsburg and Allegheny (Pa.) Spiritualists. Rev. Geo. C. Day, respected pastor of the First Church of Allegheny, had the meeting in charge, and in a most pleasing manner welcomed the great crowd of humanity to Ideal Camp, and to partake of the spiritual food so freely offered them. Our beloved sister, Mrs. E. J. Demorest, followed with convincing proof of spirit return, and many other good mediums took part in the program. Meetings are to be continued each Sunday. With our able workers we expect to add many new followers to our ranks."

A newspaper dispatch says: "The police officials of Cleveland, Ohio, have ordered all fortune tellers and clairvoyants engaged in the business in that city either to quit their calling or leave the city."

The Bloomington (Ill.) Pantagraph says: "Last night at the residence of Mr. and Mrs. John F. Myers, 924 West Front street, a little circle of Spiritualists held a seance, the media being Mrs. Pemberton, of this city, and Mrs. Skeeles, of Onarga. The latter had the leading part of the meeting in charge, and through her a lecture was given and exhortations presumably from various spirits. The believers in Spiritualism urge that conclusive proof of the genuineness of the theory lies in the fact that while Mrs. Skeeles is an uneducated woman, some of the spirits talking through her use the best language and the purest diction. This was especially true of the lecture and the closing talks. The seance conducted by Mrs. Pemberton was what is called trumpet speaking. This was done in a dark room, the trumpet having been laid on a table, and the circle having joined hands in order to complete a circuit. A number of voices were heard through it, some of them being whispers and others clearly intonated. These were usually of short duration, and gave names which were familiar to the ladies and gentlemen present. The address and other talks given through Mrs. Skeeles were given in plain light. The meeting was conducted by having sacred songs interspersed throughout the visitations. To those present who were not accustomed to the seances there was a weird sense of the sincerity of the members present and a longing to know how the dark scenes would look in daylight, an utter impossibility, the medium says, if the spirits come."

Mrs. B. M. Knowles writes: "The Independent Home of Detroit, Mich., will be dedicated at Island Lake camp grounds, on July 27, at 4 p. m.; services to be conducted by Mrs. Margaret La Grange, of Detroit. We will also celebrate the anniversary of our worthy friend and co-worker, Mr. John D. Boyle, on the same day. All are welcome to our celebration."

T. Grimshaw, the lecturer, writes from St. Louis, Mo.: "Our society, the First Spiritual Association of St. Louis, has purchased a magnificent stone church building, formerly belonging to the Episcopalians. The building is comparatively new, only having been erected about eight years. The seating capacity is about 500. A school room in rear 28 x 45, class rooms, kitchen, steam heating plant, electric light fixtures, pews, carpets and a fine pipe organ valued at $3,500. We are very proud of our new possession, and feel it is the forerunner of a new era of progress for the cause in St. Louis."

The camp meeting at Mantua Station, Ohio, opens July 26 and closes September 1. The committee, consisting of M. C. Danforth, D. M. King and R. N. Wilcox, send forth a programme. We make an extract therefrom, as follows: "In extending this, our 14th annual greeting, we have no apology to make further than we simply wish to state that owing to the sickness and death of many of our officers and coworkers within the past year, we have been somewhat delayed in getting out our printed matter. However, we shall open camp and School on Saturday, July 26, and continue until September 1, with good speakers, mediums and instructors. The Psychic School will be a special feature for developing speakers and mediums. We extend to all a kindly greeting, and invite those who have an inspiration for Purity and Progress, to come and join in the work." The following speakers and mediums will be present: Mr. Joseph King, materializing, for the entire camp; D. M. King, inspirational, and psychic instructor; Mrs. Bessie Woodard, inspirational and test; Mrs. L. Brown, inspirational, business and trance; Mrs. H. E. Andrews, clairvoyant and healing; Mrs. F. Barber, psychic and inspirational; Mrs. Mary Moss, clairvoyant and test; Wm. H. Thomas, trance; M. H. Danforth, inspirational.

Port Orchard Independent, Washington, has the following illustrating spirit influence: "The evening of the storm Mrs. Oros' house was struck by lightngin and there are some very mysterious circumstances in connection with it. When the storm came, Mrs. Oros, her sister and son were in the house and she says some mysterious influence came over her and told her to get out of the house. Her little boy got out first and she followed, but her sister wanted to get her hat and cloak. Mrs. Oros begged her to come out, which she did, and they had gone only a few feet when a blinding flash of lightning came and struck a very tall tree, ran along the ground into the door they had just left, and out of a window, smashing it into a thousand pieces. Now the singular part of this influence was the fact that Mrs. Oros was prompted to leave shelter and go out into the storm instead of staying in the house, which would have been the safest place under ordinary circumstances."

A. W. Keller writes: "Sunday, July 13, was the closing day for the services of the Englewood Spiritual Union. In the afternoon services, or conference meeting, several speakers and mediums were present and assisted in the work, including Mrs. Georgia G. Cooley and Mrs. F. V. Jackson. The evening service was in charge of Harry J. Moore. His farewell lecture will not be forgotten by those present, and his eloquence of delivery still lingers in the memory of the regular attendants of the services. We hope for an early return of his engagement for the fall opening. There was many a tear-stained face at the close of the services when we had to bid good-bye to such a noble worker for the cause of truth and Spiritualism."

G. H. Brooks writes from 114 President street, Wheaton, Ill.: "The little society organized in Wheaton, Ill., in our home, is not dead, though we are not doing much, as there are but few of us, and since the organization we have suffered by removals and deaths, yet we hold the society, and all the old officers were re-elected to serve another year. It has been our intention of holding a grove meeting in Glen Ellen some Sunday, but the weather has been so unsettled we have felt it best to wait awhile longer. I am still enjoying my vacation, and feel the summer will not be half long enough for me."

John W. Ring writes from Galveston, Tex.: "The work of Mrs. Georgia Gladys Cooley was very much appreciated in Texas, and I hear but the best of reports of her work. The annual meeting of the Texas State National Association of Spiritualists will be held in Galveston, Texas, September 5, 6, 7 and 8 1902."

U. G. Figley, of Bryan, Ohio, writes: "I have some Spiritualist papers that I will send free for missionary purposes, or to the poor, on receipt of postage."

Wm. Given writes from South Dakota: "Please accept my heartfelt thanks for making it possible for me to acquire such a valuable library."

S. W. Gould writes: "You are doing a good work. People are thinking as never before, and a great revelation is in progress. There's a good time coming."

Mrs. Catharine McFarlin is one of the leading speakers at the Wonewoc camp.

Oliver C. Sabin writes: "I send you a copy of a little German book, this day issued from our presses. This book will be sent free to every German-speaking person who writes for it on or before the first day of October. We have also English publications on this subject, for which we charge. Please help me to give away these books. Address me as follows: Lock Box 374, Washington, D. C."

Herbert L. Whitney writes: "The board of trustees of the Freeville camp-meeting association, Freeville, N. Y., has granted August 8 as state day for the benefit of our state association, which will be represented by H. W. Richardson, president, and Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, second vice-president. It is earnestly hoped that a large attendance will make this a successful day, both financially and spiritually. Individual membership fee, $1.00."

E. L. Crosby writes from Des Moines, Iowa: "Brother and Sister Kates, of Washington, D. C., held meetings here under a tent in one of our public squares, from July 10 to 16 inclusive, with the result that the Spiritualists of this city are re-awakened, and reorganized, adopting the name of First Spiritualist Church of Des Moines, Ia., and electing officers for the ensuing term as follows: President, Mrs. Ella C. Brewer; vice-president, E. J. Beaulio; secretary, E. L. Crosby; treasurer, Mrs. S. A. Garber; trustees, R. A. Owens, B. A. Bean and Mrs. Leah Hendricks. We all regret that Brother and Sister Kates could not remain with us longer, for as the meetings progressed, the interest increased apace, the last the evenings the tent being filled, with hundreds on the outside. The lectures were well received, as also were the tests given by Sister Kates. We hope they may return to Des Moines in the near future."

Laura Matlock writes: "The tenth annual meeting for the election of officers of the Michigan State Spiritual Association will be held in Lansing, Tuesday, August 12. We look forward to a large attendance, and hope the local societies will put forth an extra effort to send as many delegates as their membership will permit."

Mr. Ruffles an excellent medium, has commenced holding Sunday meetings, morning and evening, at 610 W. Madison street.

J. M. White writes: "I will be at liberty after Aug 9. If I do not remain at the camp at Marshalltown Iowa, I wish to hold meetings at Missouri Valley, Blair, Neb., and other points convenient to Council Bluffs."

Mrs. A. E. Sheets writes: "Grand Ledge (Mich.) camp-meeting will open July 27, and close August 24. A nice new cottage is being built for Mrs. Huhn, of Sarinac, Mich. James H. Riley, the materializing medium, will be present our last week. A good slate writer would do well, and we would like to correspond with one for the camp. Reliable mediums are cordially invited to be present."

"They do not line up with The Progressive Thinker." Mrs. Geo. Pooler writes: "We have concluded that out here at Camp Union, Sheridan Gulch, Sheridan Ill., we cannot do without your paper, so I send you $1 to renew my subscription. We had some copies of other papers sent to us for gratuitous distribution at our meetings, but they do not line up with The Progressive Thinker. Long may it live. We started our camp and meetings which we hope to continue for several weeks, if the weather permits. We shall have additions to our camp next week; more mediums and more people, and we shall try to work them all into some line of work, fishing, boating, cooking, talking, healing, etc., and you can bet there is one thing they can all do after being here a little while, and that is eating all that is set before them, whether it be turtle soup, eel or whatever else there may be."

The Bohemian Magnetic Healer, Vincel Drahos, D. M., of Cedar Rapids, Iowa, will spend two or three weeks at the Clinton camp. He is said to perform remarkable cures.

Dr. J. W. Ruminer writes from Evansville, Ind.: "Moses Hull closed a series of three lectures at this point on the 8th inst., and the seed sown will surely bring forth good fruit; of course phenomena hunters were not so well pleased, but those more on the mental plane were very much elated. The good, however, that is to come is through the Morris Pratt Institute, which is located at Whitewater, Wisconsin. It is gratifying to know that such an institution has been put on a solid basis, so that it will not go down as did the Belle Bush school, at Belvidere, New Jersey. It behooves all Spiritualists of wealth to assist financially in maintaining these schools of progress as it would surely make them more happy and contented henceforth. The time is here for such an enterprise, and let us all do what little we can if not with money, with voice, tongue and pen and thus aid our fellowmen to a higher understanding of life. Those wishing full information on the subject would do well to subscribe for the 'Curriculum,' a journal issued from the institute, which I presume will be edited by Moses Hull; the price of the magazine is one dollar per year, payable when the first issue comes out and you receive a copy; the first issue will be out about December 1. The subscription list was increased to about fifty while Mr. Hull was here. One thousand subscribers insures its publication, so let the good work go on."

Beautiful Onset.

Once more the friends here gathered in this beautiful spot send greetings to their many friends who read The Progressive Thinker, as well as the staff gathered at the office of this bright up-to-date paper. The meeting opened last Sunday; the weather was all that could be desired. The audience was large, the address by Dr. George A. Fuller was a masterly one. The address by Mrs. C. Fannie Allyn was bright and to the point, and the tests by Mrs. Effie Webster gave a finish to a memorable day. Conferences were held Monday, Wednesday and Friday. These days are looked forward to by the campers, and many very interesting thoughts are expressed at these meetings, and they give an opportunity for all to come to the front and add their mite for the benefit of all. Thursday Mrs. Kate M. Stiles gave the address. She took subjects from the audience, and in a very masterly way answered those presented to her. Saturday the Veterans' Spiritual Union will have charge of the meeting and a good time is expected.

The Middleboro Band furnishes music every Sunday, and crowds come to listen to the concerts.

There are many improvements at Onset this year; the electric cars run through from Boston, also from New Bedford, and this makes direct connections with many local villages, and it gives an opportunity for many to visit the meetings, therefore we expect to do splendid missionary work this year. We have a great many mediums present upon the grounds, and there are all ways of work here for good honest mediums.

We are most fortunate to have Mr. A. J. Maxham for our vocalist. This gentleman always gets an ovation when he makes his appearance in camp; his genial spirit and his harmonious voice are recognized by all, and they are pleased to greet him. Everything here has a gala appearance, and everyone is trying to make someone else happy. Once more we waft a breeze from good old Onset to our friends in the West, and we hope to greet many of them before the season is over. HATCH.

From Mantua Station, Ohio.

Moses Hull is here at Mantua for a few days' visit. He is looking well. He lectures in Chardon next Sunday, July 20. Then he goes west to attend camp-meeting. He reports that the school this year was a success at Lily Dale.

I wish to say to the friends who are writing so many letters to the secretary of Maple Dell Camp, that we will make the terms and conditions just as low and favorable for every one as possible, and keep the camp moving.

We are receiving letters every day from young people who are speakers and mediums, or want to be developed as such. I will give a sample letter. A boy 13 years old writes:

"I am a medium. I give readings with what I get from the spirit side of life. I also deliver inspirational lectures of about twenty or thirty minutes in length. What can you do for me at Maple Dell Camp? I have to make my own way."

Let us hear from others. Direct your letters to Lucy King, secretary, Mantua Station, Ohio, Box 45.

For the last year we have lost by death ten of our old, faithful members, and co-workers for Maple Dell camp.

Since we organized the National Spiritual and Religious Camp Association here in Ohio fourteen years ago, over one-half of our stockholders have gone to the spirit world, or somewhere else. For this reason we ask all who have certificates of stock in the National Spiritual and Religious Camp Association of Mantua, Ohio, to write to us; also persons holding certificates of ordination from the above society, will please report to us; also all branch societies holding charters granted them by the above association, will please be kind enough to report.

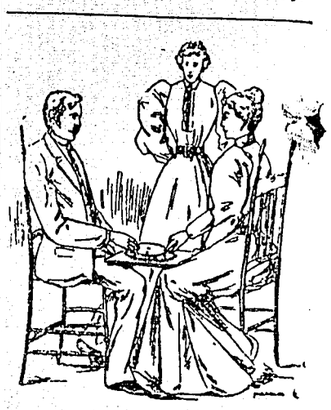
Briggs Park Camp.



Last Sunday was a beautiful day and a large crowd turned out to greet Mr. and Mrs. Carpenter. About 900 were on the grounds. To-day, July 16, is "State Day." It is in charge of Mrs. Carpenter and Dr. Knowles. Mr. Carpenter could not be present. The services were conducted by Mrs. Ferris, Mrs. Schumm, Mrs. Fuller, Mrs. Morrell and Dr. Knowles of Grand Rapids, and Mrs. Carpenter. Mr. Herrick closed the services by giving a cabinet seance on the rostrum. Altogether a pleasant day was spent by the 250 who were present.

Mr. D. A. Herrick will remain with us as chairman and fill the dates made vacant by the sad and sudden transition of Dr. E. E. Parker.

Frank N. Foster is the only new arrival since last writing you. In all we have nearly forty tenting on the grounds and expect more next week. On account of sickness Mrs. Cooley was obliged to cancel her engagement. While it caused us no inconvenience so far as securing other talent was concerned, yet it was a disappointment, as we all wished to meet her.

Memorial services will be held in honor of Dr. Parker to-morrow (Thursday) evening.

Loe F. Prior and daughter will be here Friday. The best of feeling prevails and all are having an enjoyable time. THOS. J. HAYNES, Sec'y.

THE PSYCHOGRAPH
—OR—
DIAL PLANCHETTE.

This instrument is substantially the same as that employed by Prof. Hare in his early investigations. In its improved form it has been before the public for more than seven years, and in the hands of thousands of persons has proved its superiority over the Planchette, and all other instruments which have been brought out in imitation, both in regard to certainty and correctness of the communications received by its aid, and as a means of developing mediumship.

Do you wish to investigate Spiritualism?
Do you wish to develop Mediumship?
Do you desire to receive Communications?

The Psychograph is an invaluable assistant. A pamphlet with full directions for the Formation of Circles and Cultivation of Mediumship

with every instrument. Many who were not aware of their mediumistic gift, have, after a few sittings, been able to receive delightful messages. A volume might be filled with commendatory letters. Many who began with it as an amusing toy, found that the intelligence controlling it knew more than themselves, and became converts to Spiritualism.

Capt. D. B. Edwards, Orient, N. Y., writes: "I and communications (by the Psychograph) from many other friends, even from old settlers whose gravestones are moss-grown in the old yard. They have been highly satisfactory, and proved to me that Spiritualism is indeed true, and the communications have given my heart the greatest comfort in the severest loss I have had of son, daughter, and their mother."

Dr. Eugene Crowell, whose writings have made his name familiar to those interested in psychic matters, writes as follows: "I am much pleased with the Psychograph. It is very simple in principle and construction, and I am sure must be far more sensitive to spiritual power than the one now in use. I believe it will generally supersede the latter when its superior merits become known."

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE.

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. HUDSON TUTTLE.

I. R. Read: Q. Is it true that the wise men of ancient times had greater knowledge than we have now? I have heard this so often claimed, and pass undisputed, that it seems to be a commonly received opinion.

A. The ancient "wise men" knew nothing of science, as it is understood to-day. They were children in their ideas of nature. Those who set out to teach, did so whenever they could gain a hearing, and gave their instructions by speech. As children they were charmed with the quips and quirks of speech, the juggling of words, spoke in parables, and riddles. That of the sphinx was especially famous and aroused the greatest men of antiquity.

What is that which goes on four legs, then on two, and at last on three? Give it up? The sphinx devours all who cannot answer. At last the wise man came and said it was man: In childhood he creeps, in manhood he walks erect, and in old age carries a cane! Then all antiquity laughed. That was wisdom. Diogenes made his fame by dwelling in a tub. He was as filthy as a modern tramp, and his clothing was conspicuous by its absence. "What will you have?" asked the world-conquering Alexander as he rode past. "Speak and it shall be granted." "That you get out of my sunshine," was the boorish answer, and again the people laughed, and scholars ever since have been amazed at the reply!

Socrates had one desire and that was to take the conceit out of the sophists, and he invented a method of reasoning which outflanked and defeated them. That same method has served those who studied to deceive the people ever since with a show of wisdom which was only verbiage. And yet Socrates was one of the most distinguished sages.

The so-called teachings and customs of other philosophers may be learned by the following story.

The soldiers of Alexander the Great found some of the philosophers, known as gymno-sophists because they discarded clothing. They were tramping from place to place overflowing with gab whenever they drew a crowd, and this was easy among a people who had nothing to do but gossip and politics. They were said to be the most astute of all their sect. Alexander desired to test their amazing wisdom, and selected one for a judge and then asked them the most difficult questions. Of the first he asked, "Which is the most numerous, the living or the dead?" to which came the reply, "the living, for the dead no longer exist."

To the second, "Which produces the largest animals, the earth or the sea?" The answer came, "The earth, for the sea is a part of it."

The third, "Which is the craftiest of all animals?" "That with which man is not acquainted."

The fourth, "What was your reason for persuading your king to revolt?" "Because I wished him to live with honor, or die as a coward deserves."

The fifth, "Which do you think the oldest, the day or the night?" "The day, by one day."

The sixth, "What are the best means for a man to make himself loved?" "If possessed of great power, do not make himself feared."

The seventh, "How can a man become a God?" "By doing what it is impossible for a man to do."

The eighth, "Which is strongest, life or death?" "Life, because it has so many evils."

The ninth, "How long is it good for a man to live?" "As long as he does not prefer death to life."

The tenth was to pronounce a judgment, for those who answered wrongly were to be put to death.

"They have all answered one worse than the other."

"If this is thy judgment," said Alexander, "thou shalt die first."

"Not unless you choose to break your word, for you declared the man who answered worst should die first."

This so pleased him that he dismissed them with presents.

Again, one of these tramps claiming wisdom, came before Alexander, and throwing down a dry hide began walking around its edges. As he trod on one side the other started up continually. Then he stepped into the middle when it lay still. By this he forcibly illustrated to the conqueror to plant himself in the center of his empire, and not wander around his border.

Moral precepts were the first to be clearly defined, and the system of these philosophers, was such as to make it possible for them to arrive at right conclusions. Beyond this, in the realms of knowledge of nature, of the elements of living beings, they knew little, and speculated instead of observing. In reading the literature of ancient times the student finds here and there a statement corresponding to modern ideas, heralded it as a wonderful proof of the vast knowledge of those ancient days. Taken as a whole, however, science as understood to-day was unknown. The Bible itself makes the earth the center around which sun and moon revolve, and flat as a board. Galileo was tortured because he contradicted the inspired book and pagan antiquity. Their astronomy, in which they were most proficient, was simply the apparent position of the stars in the heavens. Their geography was confined to a narrow spot on the globe. Of geology, chemistry, physiology, anatomy, they knew nothing.

In short, with the exception of the moral disputation, not a thing taught by any or all the philosophers of antiquity would be admissible to the schools of the present.

Years are spent in learning the dead languages that the old literature may be gleaned over for priceless treasures, but the treasures are not there. It is disappointing.

The age of parables, of riddles, of the use of words as though they were entities and of themselves explaining all questions, has passed. The day of the philosopher who explains everything by means of his internal consciousness, and volubility of speech has passed, and the knowledge of to-day as much surpasses that of antiquity in its most glorious age, as that of the man exceeds that of the child.

LAW OF IMMORTALITY.

Considerations Along Scientific Lines.

Life Is, and we postulate:—always was, always will be—and in the light of late scientific developments there is nothing but life.

Again God, we say, is omnipresent, omniscient, and omnipotent.

Now if these two statements be true, then by God we mean Life; God being omnipotent, God substance is all there is. Therefore all there is, is Life—no inert matter, but living, moving, breathing, palpitating substance, whose attributes are omnipresence, omniscience and omnipotence.

So God and Life are convertable terms with an identity of meaning.

Life or God being omnipresent, there is no place for anything else; so then, it logically follows that there is no inertia of so-called matter, only and simply federations of phrasing Life or Spirit or God—as you please.

But why do we accept these statements of Being as true? In the first place, scientists are discovering there is no absolute quietude or death of so-called matter, but a simple slumbering (as to sphere) of substance, also that the law of reproduction in species and the upward and downward sweep of evolutions and involutions way is inherent in all things—even the rocks of the earth—all mother earth, of which man is simply an evolving factor, keeping step, as step it must in the planet's march of embodied soul through the measureless cycles of its endless being.

I say the mind cannot work through creeping horrors of gropings in abysmal nothingness after a resting place for a something to mother and father the constellations, suns and us; but with a universe of inherent law and power—beginningless, endless and boundless all is different; reason can busy itself and find pegs for every situation, and then, too, I can be sure I am at one with the universe, that in me and of me is the law and I am of the fashion and fabric of all things.

But how did nature (and I am nature) fashion myself, the stars and the endless trains of constellations and oddlots, and harness things in immutable law—merging all for immortality by the simple shifting of equations (if it is by the shifting of equations).

THIS IS THE QUERY.

This much is a certainty—we have come to know, really know, that at least life continues beyond what we call death, and because of this knowledge we predicate immortality, but what the mysterious law is that makes for immortality we have waited until this day at the borderland with question.

Sentiment has bridged the seen with the unseen realities, and returning spirits have given us knowledge of a continuity of life, but this is all. Tradition hints at no law and the mighty hosts of philosophers that have speculated from the beginning of history, bring no light. Even our own metaphysical reasoners fail to answer the query of the hour of the endlessness of life by form but grope with the children of their brain for a scientific fact to ferry to the unseen land, but only the knowledge gained by psychical research societies and their own bewildering theories pull for the shore.

E. D. Babbitt, one of California's professors of fine forces, comes startlingly near to demonstrating the law for the immortality of man in his theories over the beating of the heart and the consequent circulation of the blood. But science these days is serving strange hints of futures. We all are feeling a stir and a thrill as of some new marvelous events coming—we catch a richness of answering to our questioning and so easy comes flash-lights of unbidden, bewildering truths, and knowledge is as near that even I think I glimpse the law for the marching of the infinities, and so simple too, it seems while the results are so stupendous that I am staggered that such a trifle should forerun and be the whip and spur to such august immortals as the universe of things.

So-called revelation and sentiment have given us the most of what we thought true of the mechanism of being. Revelation however often reveals nothing, while sentiment is only a nimbus of knowledge. Sentiment, though, is an important factor in affairs, for it is the outworking of the emotions and the child of intuition and when stimulated by scientific thought, becomes a beautiful embodiment for exact truths.

And so it is that sentiment is leader to controversy, and controversy is the prime factor for the immortality of the thought realm, and thought is the omnipotent metathesis of things.

Controversy is like the tiding of the suns and the answering back of constellations—like the battle of the elements—like the angry flashing of the lightning bolt trailing its thunderous way through the opposing hosts of atmosphere—all lead for changed levels and the continuity of substance.

For millions of years (we reason) have controversial threshings waned and waxed furious in form, and builded in the man of to-day, and his works, the so-assayed riches of the ages.

Even with these splendid points of opposition, man is not content to dally, but is impelled by the law to grope ever in the quest for the law for the things that are manifest.

So it is evident then, that whether substance manifest in the mental or the physical realm, in a sun or a molecule, the same law must verge to all.

It is by tireless searching patience that scientists have come to know that the cosmos exists in polarity—positive and negative expressions in endless processions of precision. Heart-beats of substance in couples and each mystical couple a positive or a negative unite by position, giving answer back and forth to other tensions of energy—grades of force—mighty workshops of embodied power, hammering away and forging the links of a universal being.

Formation is inherent to substance, and substance includes everything seen and unseen—tangible and intangible.

Formation is always dual and circumscribed by lower tensioned and associating colonies of duplex vitality.

But what is this law for elaborating expression whose exact formula recognizes all form and attributes of form to train in its march forever? It is this:—

Two oppositely electrified substances always have a tendency to equilibriumize in a third substance of lower associating polarities.

The third substance thus formed is a composite of the two contending poles of the first and second part plus the environing substance of a third part—the whole forming a composed variant of the three in a state of insulation which is the insulation to plane or sphere.

To human sight form seems insulated and independent (mostly), but this is only seeming, for every figuration is simply a link in the endlessly linked and interlinked fabric of life—a mode of changing temper, drawing substance from infinite directions and sending on in unending ways the mutations it has wrought.

The mightiest sun that swings is tethered to the rest of formation acting first to its family of worlds and second to some supreme sensorium of things; so it is strange that when two such mighty engines of force are in train, globes and globelets should be born from inreaches of polarized atoms and nebulae, at the demand of equilibrium?

Prof. Loeb in his biological researches and J. W. Kime by experimenting with photography through the human body prove that opacity and solidity of what we call matter is a delusion caused by differing electrical tensions and (for those that can read between the lines) that polarity is the father and mother of evolution and the breeder of expression.

The sun is the positive power of our system of planets, and its composed actinic ray flashing to the negative earth world, decomposes through osmotic pressure with the varying radii of our planet and establishes an equilibrium through expression as varieties of vegetable and animal life, and in these vegetable and animal figurations is seen immortalities' way for matriculating to other planes the earth ego.

See the beautiful adaptation to uses is this law for man. In man we have its perfect syllogism—the major premiss of visible form, in the ventrical powers of the heart and the minor premiss in the substance of personality, drawn from every point of the compass, as food for the equilibrium of the human major poles, and every polarized bit so drawn for equilibrium or personality means what we call death for the little sensitized atom, which is only its metempsychosis for a different sphere in human anatomy.

All forms have a continuous and overlapping embodiment and give for reproduction overlaps of energy. For instance—hen life—she at times embodies an egg formed by demand of over pressure.

These pressure formations are ever going on, whether in atom, man or sun, caused by the insistence for equilibrium of contending major poles all along the line of being. When two oppositely electrified substances approach each other they become denser. In this manner rain is formed, cyclones, etc., and by a parity of reasoning, eggs and all offspring of expression.

Continuous expressions over continuous threads of power for fulcra. Not only from spheres like hen, man, or sun is this formative process carried on but by every atom and molecule that compose a body.

No matter what grade the body is, it radiates the surplus energy links and interlinks every conceivable point with endless forces that stretch in interminable weavings throughout infinity and the intersecting knots of energy become recouperative bonds of power. But our human eyes, fortunately cannot see these bewildering knots and lines of power, only those which are similarly tensioned with us—the hen, for instance, and her egg, which egg is formed by the demand of ever pressure by hen poles. This surplus energy follows the law and seeks its equilibrium in a substance of a least resistance which is found in the viscera of the hen and by which it composes as an ovule—a wonderful trinity of powers (negative powers)—a world in itself containing all the power and potency in the raw material of its embodiment to meta morphose for a higher plane of being.

The ovule embosoms a microscopic type of parent life (negative type), but if a positive polarity in same grade of species impinges hen life, this osmosis results in a composite, active variant of hen type in the ovule. But the egg is thrown off from parent hen as surplusage, and then actinic magnetism takes it in hand and transmutes its embodiment to organized form after the plan inhering in egg.

This is absorption of sphere and evolution for other planes.

When this absorption of the contents of the egg is fully accomplished, the transmuted ovule now follows the inherent law, which must be obeyed—breaks its shell of insulation in search for more substance in which to continue equilibrium.

It emerges a chicken and seeks a composing substance for its equilibrium in food and air, by which (and all the inreaches of infinity) it constantly renews and overlaps embodiment as flesh, bones and blood, and this is its equilibrium, where the great engines of hen polarity are answered by the tides of the flesh.

In a so continuous way does the chicken round up to hen life—absorbs its sphere and dies (as we say). Now what?

Transformation to spirit. 'Tis the law that the major poles and all the minor associating polarities of a body making for change of plane or sphere externalize equilibrium, as a matrix for evolving spirit.

Man for instance, eats food but it is quickly externalized as to spirit in flesh, bones and blood, and all the while the entity is reciprocating (as by the law) with a more radiant force of a higher electrical tension which expresses itself, as to the earth body (to my own way of thinking) in the mathematical formula for electrical currents as CCC equals E divided by R both electrical currents (for a third substance equilibriumizing by the fine, radiating forces of the earth body.

And this is the modus of the evolution of the spirit entity in its co-ordination with earthly bodies—earth expression serves as a matrix for spirit formation working by the same formula of law as the egg does for its microscopic hen.

There comes a time, however, when the evolving spirit expression exhausts the earth matrix and earth plane, as to itself, then what we call death ensues—the earth expression, or shell, falls back to earth because equilibrium is destroyed—for this specific earth life—falls back as a fine force—or helping hand—to lift (by the law) more negative earth substances to higher levels. The spirit expression thus formed, quickly frees itself from visible things, forms, centralizes (as by the law) moves across the "gulf" (which is no across nor gulf) to spiritual fields for its third substance to continue equilibrium in over lapping embodiment. And lo! the "stygian gulf" is not stygian but is beamed by the glories of spiritual suns. And thus it is; on, on in forever's march to the law of immortality.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

LIGHT, LONDON, ENGLAND.

RELIGION.

In "Light" for June 14, page 286, "H. W. T." tells us a good deal of what religion is not, and rightly so, but says comparatively little regarding what religion is. May I be permitted to draw his attention to the following extracts from an address by the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D. D., which, I think, supplements his useful little article. The Rev. Mr. Crothers says:

"Religion is something that a man is loyal to; ready to die for and live for; the highest force; the holiest thing he knows; his aspirations after the Infinite and the perfect. Shall we treat religion as a conventional thing; a temporary thing; something which is peculiar to one country—or shall we treat it as a great elemental divine power, the power of God in human life?

"I think the man who has a religious impulse in himself has the key for the interpretation of the whole history of humanity in all generations. There is nothing foreign, nothing strange. It is simply human nature, weak and imperfect, striving upward, under the circumstances of its own age, with the traditions that happen to be around it, toward the ideal perfection, which is the goal of all our endeavor.

"Is there any mood which the human soul has ever felt which does not sometimes thrill the sensitive heart to-day? Then we realize that amid all these outward differences there is unity—one ceaseless aspiration after the perfect, by men who, themselves, are imperfect; a struggle for liberty on the part of men who are only half free.

"One of the keys of the situation is to give up altogether the idea that long ago religion was being made, that the religion that we have to-day is less vital and less imbued with the primitive instincts and hopes of men than that in some far-off age.

"Courage, love, devotion are lifted up to the heights. Behold there the ever-present mystery of godliness. All life is touched at last by something which we cannot understand. The whole life of man, all his civilization, all his knowledge, all his achievements, are borne along by eternal forces and reach at length to that great mystery wherein the thought of that which is highest in man blends insensibly with religion and with worship."

There is then but one Religion and that is Love, or man's consciousness of his relationship to and identity with the Universal Life and Love; the Immanent Spirit. The expressions of man's desire to realize his ideal of goodness, truth, purity, and beauty have taken many forms, or modes of manifestation, but "the" fundamental intuition has ever been the same, and this primal truth of consciousness is even more vital, more active, to-day than at any period in the history of the race. There is less theology, less intolerance, and that is a great gain; but there is an ever-increasing activity of the spiritual consciousness and a more general diffusion of knowledge and a higher average of results in practical everyday morality.

ARE ANIMALS IMMORTAL?

I have been interested in reading the various letters in "Light" on the question of the immortality of animals. This is a complex question, possibly not to be decided here, or even in the immediate hereafter. The evidence of spirits is conflicting; but this proves nothing either way. If those spirits who love to observe the manifestation of the Father in animal life are surrounded by animals in the psychic plane, and if other spirits who regard the love of animals as a phase of experience to be developed into something higher see no animal life of a permanent kind, this is but an example of Ruskin's teaching, that in Nature "if you look for curves you will see curves, and if you look for straight lines you will see straight lines;" and also of the larger fact, which includes this truth of Ruskin's, that we are in that higher plane circumstanced according to our ability to perceive, to use, and to enjoy. Hence that A. sees no animal proves no more than that he, individually, sees no animals. It does not even prove that he will not attain the capacity of seeing them.

There are some spirits who teach that animals survive so long as we want them. That is to say, I have a pet dog or cat which I love; so long as I want it it survives in this form, but when I tire of it the sham animal (for it is no other) is resolved into its elemental state. Personally I do not call this the survival of animals, but the survival of an error; for if what I take to be an animal is after all only my thought of the creature, and has no existence apart from my thought of it, this animal is not a reality, but a (to me) hideous sham!

Other spirits tell us of their belief that all animal life survives, by right of the Divine element within it; that it develops on its own lines and perfects itself in its own place, reaching finally a consciousness of the existence and love of God. Notwithstanding all the apparent difficulties that lie in the way of this teaching, such as the survival of countless insects, etc., it is the teaching to which I am drawn. True, animals are at present apparently devoid of self-consciousness, and of the religious instinct, but so is every baby and every idiot, and I do not think it lies with us to affirm that so noble a creature as the horse, dog or elephant is incapable of development, any more than it is our concern to find room for the surplus insects and reptiles. We are not responsible for the latter, not having created them, and I think we may safely leave them to their Creator; they are of no special interest to us except as being his creatures, with possible developments of their own. But other animals are of special interest to us. These possess in a marked degree intelligence, reason, and what is more important, love. I say more important, for are we not told from of old that "God is love?" If this does not teach us the final importance of the power of loving, what does it teach? If animals give, and need, only thing more than another it is love; and through their love they reach intelligence, often far beyond that of their human companions. They also practice telepathy of their own—which is more than most of us can do at present; and they are so far related to the spiritual plane as readily to perceive spirits.

But without regard to what they can or cannot do in their present development, I feel emphatically that it is not in our power to determine what attribute endows immortality, or is necessary to it.

SUB-HUMAN IMMORTALITY.

One of the truest things that St. Paul ever wrote was "No man can understand the things of a man save the spirit of the man which is within him." How then can a man understand the things of a sub-human with whom he cannot hold converse? Should he not be more humble and deem that a cat might with equal justice say, "No man knoweth the spirit of a cat, or any other sub-human, save the spirit of that sub-human which is within it?" How can Dr. Peebles or any other man who cannot understand the language of a sub-human creature, presume to speak for that sub-human and deny to it spiritual faculties, worship, etc., in its degree? To my mind it is shocking presumption, and dogmatism of the worst kind; dogmatism about what we do not and never, in this world, can know. The presumption is wholly in favor of sub-human immortality; all are "animals."

WORKING FOR ANIMALS.

I am a subscriber to your journal of only a few weeks, but feel emboldened to write to you, since one of your correspondents has mentioned something I wrote in the "Vegetarian."

I am a vegetarian for conscience sake, and a great part of my life is taken up in fighting the battles and championing the cause of dumb animals. My own special humanitarian work is the voluntary rescue of stray cats and dogs. In less than three years I have saved between six and seven hundred of these poor creatures from our streets. I am deeply interested in Spiritualism, but I must say that, being a passionate lover of animals, I am a little disappointed at the way some of your writers speak of animal immortality, and at the very uncertain attitude of spirits towards this subject. The passage quoted in "R. B.'s" letter in Light of June 28 would seem to show that animals have no gratitude, and that man has. Sir, I work both for lost animals, and among some of the lowest and poorest "East Enders," and I emphatically assert that my dumb animals are far more grateful than the human ones. I find that I may give my heart's blood for the young persons in my factory girls' club, and they don't care a bit, or show a spark of real gratitude, but the poor little stray cats I feed and shelter manifest every mark of affection and thankfulness, and lovingly caress the hands stretched out to befriend them. Animals do worship, and man is their God. It is disappointing to me to read that some spirits do not know whether animals live again or not. Surely they must know, and are capable of saying a simple "yes" or "no" on the subject. I am a believer in their immortality, and in the sacredness of life, human and sub-human. It would indeed be painful to me to disbelieve in their future life. If spirits do not know if there are animals on the planes where they live, how can we trust them as reliable informants on other subjects? A little dumb friend sits close beside me on the table as I write, and when his gentle eyes look up into mine I feel there is a soul behind them, and I do not want to go to a heaven where he is not. But cannot the spirits throw light on the subject? Cannot they tell us definitely what becomes of the souls of the beasts?

INEXPLICABLE NOISES.

Some years ago I had a relative dying of cancer. One night a male servant sitting up with him heard a noise as if the house were tumbling down. It was, or seemed to be, so loud that he thought everybody would be disturbed and seek to know what was the matter. The dying man remarked, "What a noise the horses are making!" But even if they had been, the stables were too far off for them to be heard. On another night someone knocked at his door. The nurse being afraid (why?) to open it, he did so himself. There was no one there, and the whole of the rest of the household had long since retired. I have not heard of similar occurrences in connection with any others of my family; and I may mention that I then knew nothing of Spiritualism.

A friend of mine told me that when an aunt was dying, a noise as of a bird singing proceeded from a picture, and was heard and commented on by a lawyer who had come to arrange affairs. The aunt's name was Rebecca, and the picture was one of Rebecca at the Well.

The unseen world at such times often seems to make a special effort to attract attention by noises, clocks stopping, and so on. I do not know whether any work is published dealing with such phenomena as apart from phantoms and appearances, but I am sure such an one would prove of great interest.

Laura B. Payne Doing Missionary Work.

I write to give a brief account of my missionary work in Oklahoma and Texas.

June 25, I went to Guthrie, Okla., where I met a number of enthusiastic Spiritualists who were desirous of organizing a society. The preliminary work was done but the organization could not be completed while I was there, for lack of time to get all together who would take part therein, some living fifteen miles away at a small town called Crescent City.

A day was set for the completion of the organization.

June 29 I went to Dallas, Tex., where I organized a lyceum with a good membership, stayed ten days lecturing in a hall on Sundays, and holding parlor meetings during the week.

Our people there are harmonious and energetic. They are now determined to build a temple, and if there are any who want to help the cause this is a good opportunity to do so by donating to this temple fund. These people are in earnest, and donations either large or small, would be encouraging and gratifying. Send them in. Write to W. L. Fox, secretary of Truth Seekers' Society of Spiritualists, Dallas, Tex.

From Dallas I came to Fort Worth. Here I was met by Judge John W. Wray and welcomed to his home where I was royally entertained by himself and good wife. On Sunday night I spoke at the Spiritualist Temple, which, by the way, is a marvel of beauty. So much had been said concerning the temple at Fort Worth that I had pictured a structure beautiful in my mind, but the picture was not overdrawn. I would that every city were as well furnished for the promulgation of our philosophy. I go from here to Hillsboro, this state. LAURA B. PAYNE.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

THE BEAUTIFUL SOUVENIR VOLUME,

(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

Only a limited number of copies of this rare book, now out of print, are to be had, and these can be obtained only at this office. Those who remit at once will receive a copy, post paid, at the GREATLY REDUCED PRICE OF $1.

Note.—By failure in 1885 to complete contract with the author, a large portion of the edition was left unbound, and so remained for a number of years, when they were rescued and bound at additional cost, hence this valuable contribution to the cause of Spiritualism was not properly presented to the Spiritualistic public, and a host of investigators have not had the opportunity of securing a copy until the present time. "THE UNKNOWN"

-BY-

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. Father Tom and the Pope,

Or a Night at the Vatican.

Written probably by Sir Samuel Ferguson. From Blackwood's Edinburg Magazine. This is a humorous account of a rollicksome visit to the Pope of Rome by Father Tom, an Irish priest, armed with a superabundance of Irish wit, two imperial quart bottles of Irish "puttean," and an Irish recipe for "conwounding" the same. "What's that?" says the Pope. "Put in the spirits first," says his Riv'rence; "and then put in the sugar; and remember, every dhrop of wather you put in after that, spoils the punch." "Glory be to God," says the Pope, not minding a word Father Tom was saying. "Glory be to God!" says he, smacking his lips. "I never known what dhrink was afore," says he. "It bates the Lachrymachrystal out of the face," says he—"it's Neethar Itself, it is, so it is," says he, wiping his epistolical mouth wid the cuff of its coat. Paper, 25cts.; cloth, 50 cents. Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

VOICE FROM ENGLAND.

Wm. E. Bonney Writes Notes of His Journey.

To the Editor:—Thinking that some of my friends who are subscribers to your valuable paper would like to know something of my whereabouts, I send a short article giving an account of my travels since I left your bustling city on the 13th of June. I left Chicago at 3 p. m., on Thursday, on the Wabash, arriving at Detroit the same evening and from thence via the Canadian Pacific to Montreal, Canada, reaching that city safely at 7 p. m. on Friday evening.

Soon after our arrival at Montreal we were informed that the transfer bus was ready to take passengers for the Allan Line Steamship Tunisian to the docks so we had to go on board without having taken a look at the thriving Canadian city. On arriving at the docks we had to watch the large number of baggage wagons as they came in with huge loads of baggage, so that each passenger could claim their respective property and have each piece properly labeled, either "Wanted on the voyage," or "Not wanted," as the case may be.

There being a large number of Canadians and Americans going on board with the hope of attending the coronation ceremonies on their arrival in England, there was considerable stir in the large building used for assorting and labeling baggage. Our vessel, the Tunisian, is the largest vessel in the North Atlantic service, and is only about three years old. She presented a very fine appearance to those who could stand in a position where they could take in her immense size.

We left Montreal on Saturday morning at 9, and had a fine view of the country on either side of the river St. Lawrence, where that magnificent stream is not too wide for that purpose. In the evening at 7 we came in sight of the old city of Quebec, where we were allowed to go on shore for a few minutes, but started on our voyage again at 8. The old fort standing at the top of a prominent precipice attracted considerable attention and before we left gave us a salute of several guns in honor of a large number of soldiers on their way to London and South Africa.

Leaving Quebec we proceeded down the broad St. Lawrence, arriving opposite Rimonski, Can., our last stopping place, at 6 a. m. We there waited till the proper time for taking on passengers and mails, who came out to us on a small steamer. At 9:30 a. m., we proceeded on our way.

At noon Sunday we were 151 miles from Quebec and in the evening, June 15, saw patches of snow on the rugged hills of Quebec province; the weather at this time was chilly and a drizzling rain made stopping on deck disagreeable.

On Monday at 11 a. m., we passed the island of Anticosti, at the mouth of St. Lawrence, weather still chilly and not pleasant on deck; here we exchanged signals with the coast-guardsmen on shore, saw what appeared to be patches of snow on several small islands. The sun tried all day to break through the clouds, but did not have very much success. The islands in the Gulf of St. Lawrence as seen from passing vessels are barren and rugged, with scarcely any vegetation, and look very uninviting, yet they contain a considerable. Miles from Quebec at noon, 364.

A methodist minister preached on the after deck, Monday evening, on the promise of Jesus to meet with the thief in paradise, as given in Luke 23:43.

Early in the evening we met an Allan Liner bound for Canada, also passed small islands near coast of Newfoundland; passed Cape Ray at 10 p. m., and Cape Race at 6 a. m., Tuesday. At 7 o'clock Tuesday evening we passed a very large iceberg.

Wednesday found me suffering from a severe attack of mal-de-mer, or in plain English, sea-sickness and from that time my diary was neglected as I found no relief till Sunday morning. The voyage was devoid of sunshine except on Sunday, just at the end of our journey as it were, and it came in time to clear the atmosphere and give us a grand panorama on the coast of Ireland. Going from the open sea into the loch to Moville and returning back again we had the pleasure of seeing very pretty scenery. After a number of passengers for Ireland had been taken off with their baggage and mails had been transferred to the mailboat, we proceeded on our way to Liverpool, arriving there on Monday morning, 9 days from Montreal, which taking in consideration we had made three stops since leaving Montreal and been delayed a short time by a dense fog in the Irish Sea, we considered very good time.

Leaving Liverpool at 11 a. m., by Great Western train, I arrived at Reading at 6 p. m. and Basingstoke at 6:30. From here I walked to the home of my parents, about four and a half miles, and arrived there about 7:30, a day or two earlier than they expected. At the present time I am assisting in the business carried on by them for nearly fifty years. I found them both remarkably well considering their age, and still able to get around and take an interest in the affairs of life.

PASSED TO SPIRIT LIFE.

[Obituaries to the extent of ten lines only will be inserted free. All in excess of ten lines will be charged at the rate of fifteen cents per line. About seven words constitute one line.]

Passed to spirit life, July 13, Mrs. Edith L. Ellis, daughter of Mrs. A. Martin, a prominent Spiritualist of Cairo, Ill. It was an accident of a runaway, in which both mother and daughter were thrown from the surrey, and when picked up both were unconscious. Mrs. Martin was brought to after an hour's hard work, but Mrs. Ellis was beyond our human aid. Mrs. Ellis was an accomplished musician, and well known in Chicago. The funeral services were conducted by Rev. J. O. M. Hewitt, of Chicago, July 16, who delivered addresses, both at the home in Cairo, and at the cemetery at Villa Ridge, to large and attentive audiences.

J.

Passed to spirit life, at her home in Port Huron, Mich. July 11, Mrs. Mary Saph, aged 93 years. She had been a resident of Port Huron over fifty years. She was loved and respected by all. She leaves three children, one daughter and two sons, and many loving friends to bless her memory. The funeral services were conducted by Mrs. Anna Gillespie, of San Francisco. COR.

Leora Falkenstein, daughter of Dr. E. T. Spencer, passed to spirit life, June 11, 1902. She developed remarkable mediumship in early childhood. Funeral services were held at the residence of her father, who in part conducted the services. He told them he could testify from those mute lips he had received words of truth and wisdom that had rooted his faith firm in the knowledge of the immortal life.

Riverton, Neb. COR.

Mrs. Irene Dobson Salvator, prominent medium of this city, and universally beloved and respected, passed to spirit life, at the Baptist Hospital. The funeral was held at late residence, 3243 Wabash avenue, July 17.

Passed to spirit life, at her home, 565 Prospect avenue, Milwaukee, Wis., July 14, Mrs. Ella E. Stuart, aged 56 years. Mrs. Stuart suffered a stroke of paralysis a little over two years ago, from which she never fully recovered. Monday, the day of her transition, she seemed in her usual health, working in her garden in the afternoon, then prepared the supper, after which she laid down on her couch where her son found her a few moments later unconscious. She quietly passed away about an hour later. Will C. Hodge was telegraphed for, as it was her wish he should conduct the services at her demise. He could not come, so Rev. Mr. Barr, of the People's Pulpit, officiated in his stead. He is very liberal and his discourse was beautiful and impressive. Mrs. Stuart had been a Spiritualist all of her life. Always generous, scrupulously just, she was loved and respected by all; a dear, true friend whose presence was always a benediction. MARY E VAN HORN.

Catholics Protest Against Protestantism Being Taught in the Philippine Schools.

The Chicago American gives vent to the following very pointed editorial upon the subject:

It is alleged that in the American public schools in the Philippines attempts have been made by Protestant school teachers to convert to Protestantism the native children, of whom all the civilized belong to the Catholic faith.

It is difficult to believe that the public school teachers in the Philippines, or any of them, have been guilty of the charge made.

But if there has been any attempt at proselyting on the part of the school teachers, such attempt should be instantly suppressed and the teachers guilty dismissed from the service.

When a mother or father in the Philippines, or anywhere else in United States territory, sends a child to the public school, it should be with the distinct understanding that the child is sent to accumulate facts and not to be pestered or disturbed with any particular form of religious belief.

It is gratifying to know that the Catholic authorities protest vigorously against this alleged perversion of the American public school. It is to be hoped that the matter will be sifted thoroughly, and drastic action forced if the charges are proved.

We welcome this opportunity to emphasize once more the fact that in any school in which one dollar of public money is spent no religion should be taught.

The majority of those who live in the United States, whether Protestant or Catholic, believe in the Trinity.

The mission of the public school is to teach children that three times one are three.

The religious faith which tells us that in the mysterious management of the universe three times one are one should be kept separate from a child's education in arithmetic and reading and writing and the other elements of an education in common facts.

It cannot be repeated too often that there is no sound logic, no good public spirit, in the idea that an education in facts and an education in religious belief must necessarily be united.

If you send a child to a gymnasium, you do not sandwich in prayers or the reading of religious books between the various athletic exercises. You send him there to learn gymnastics.

If you send a child to dancing school, you do not insert sermons between waltzes and square dances. You send him there to learn dancing.

If you send a child to the public school, you send him there to study and acquire facts upon the truth of which all men are substantially agreed. You do not send him there to deal with those problems of faith and inspiration which for centuries have caused men to cut each other's throats and burn each other alive simply because they were made a part of government, a part of education, and a part of public taxation.

There must be no American public money spent for religious education, whether Protestant, Catholic, Jewish or other. There should be no reading of the New Testament in any public school; the reading of the New Testament is an insult to the orthodox Jew, and we tax the orthodox Jew.

There should be no reading in public schools of the Protestant version of the Old Testament. This version differs from the Catholic version, and the Catholic who pays taxes must not have his children compelled to absorb religious doctrines of which the father does not approve.

There must be no reading of the Koran in the public schools, for the Koran teaches that Christ was a man, but not a God, and this theory is offensive to Catholics and Protestants alike.

There must be no reading of the Talmud in the public schools, for the Talmud teaches that the Messiah is yet to come, and those who are not Jews are in a doubtful situation, and the Talmud is offensive to orthodox Protestants, Catholics and Mohammedans.

The public school should keep pace with human investigation of facts; it should leave speculation in religion to the home. If any religion feels that it cannot survive competition, if it fears that it must mix religion with its children's facts, it has a perfect right to do so at its own expense, but not at the expense of the public.

This may as well be understood by our friends in all religions, for this is the law of the United States, and it will not be changed, however dexterous the manipulation, while this country shall remain upon its present constitutional foundation.

Political Economy and Sloyd.

In addressing the students of Bryn Mawr College recently, Colonel Thomas Wentworth Higginson said that he thought it was absurd that political economy should be taught to girls when they were not allowed to use the principles of it. The editor of Harper's Weekly in commenting on this said that boys who were to become lawyers, ministers, etc., were taught Sloyd although they never expected to become carpenters, and why not girls political economy? Still, he is fair when he adds that the cases are not quite the same for at any time the lawyer wants to become a carpenter he may do so; "whereas the woman student of civil government and political economy is not permitted—except in three states—to relapse into politics." We are glad to quote this comment from so able a man as the editor of Harper's Weekly, but we are astonished that a man of such breadth of knowledge does not know that women are voters in four States instead of three.—Harriet Taylor Upton.

When our worth declines, our faith also declines.—Le Rochefoucauld.

Chunks of Advice.—Voltaire.

"The Magazine of Mysteries," printed in New York, and only a three-year-old publication, is yet old enough to give solid chunks of advice(!) to Spiritualists. It says:

"The communion with angels is continual with really religious men and women—God-loving Christians." Then again:

"As anyone can clearly see, the so-called modern Spiritualists are losing ground daily, and are complaining of a lack of interest and wondering and marveling why God does not prosper their cause." But the climax is reached when this self-sufficient lover of "mysteries" and miseries says:

"By 1919 Christianity will be the religion of all the educated, refined and cultured people of the Orient."

"Between now and 1906 [a short time], as it is given to us from the Divine Center, a great and tremendous bloodless battle of words and thought will have been fought between Christians and the anti-Christ people." And,

"All movements that do not recognize, honor and glorify the Son, etc., will not be recognized and honored and prospered by the Father—they must perish."

We are heartily glad to know that this "tremendous battle" is to be bloodless, and we certainly breathe much easier and freer since perusing this mysterious magazine. Properly interpreted, these portentous predictions indicate that our Christian friends are preparing to join the great army of progress and reform.

No more Auto-da-fe's. No more burning of witches; no more burnings of Brunos nor Servetus, and the poor little unbaptized babes even are to be "saved" by a decree of a Presbytery issued in the 20th century! What changes a century has seen!

Twenty-four years ago Victor Hugo, eulogizing Voltaire [1694], whose pen had been so mighty in molding public opinion in "the times that tried men's souls," said:

"In the presence of this society, frivolous and dismal, Voltaire alone, having before his eyes those united forces, the court, the nobility, capital; that unconscious power, the blind multitude; that terrible magistracy, so severe to subjects, so docile to the master, crushing and flattering, kneeling upon the people before the king; that clergy, vile melange of hypocrisy and fanaticism; Voltaire alone, I repeat it, declared war against that coalition of all the social iniquities, against that enormous and terrible world, and he accepted battle with it. And what was his weapon? That which has the lightness of the wind and the power of the thunderbolt. A pen.

"With that weapon he fought; with that weapon he conquered.

"Gentlemen, let us salute that memory.

"He has the tenderness of a woman and the wrath of a hero. He was a great mind, and an immense heart!

"He conquered the old code and the old dogma. He conquered the feudal lord, the Gothic judge, the Roman priest. He raised the populace to the dignity of people. He taught, pacificated, and civilized. * * * He accepted all the menaces, all the outrages, all the persecutions, calumny and exile. He conquered violence by a smile, despotism by sarcasm, infallibility by irony, obstinacy by perseverance, ignorance by truth."

The one aspect of Voltaire's character, says a biographer, which can be viewed with unmingled approbation, was the deep, heartfelt pity and indignation with which he regarded every flagrant act of cruelty or oppression, whether it was enacted in his own country or in the remotest part of Europe.

Another eminent Frenchman, of an earlier period, before the stormy times which Voltaire encountered, has some very creditable sentiments attributed to him by his biographer:

Cardinal Richelieu [1041-2]: "Beneath the rule of men entirely great the pen is mightier than the sword. Behold the arch enchanter's wand—itself a nothing! By taking sorcery from the master hand to paralyze the Caesars, and to strike the loud earth breathless! Take away the sword. States can be saved without it!"

With that great mind, Victor Hugo, let us honor those greater minds, whose intellectual battles in the past have made civil and religious liberty possible in the 20th century.

Spirits Appear.

It is not publicly known outside of some select circles that spirits from the next world are habitually appearing to their friends in at least several places in Boston. In a number of these places the most wonderful materializations are seen, but they are carefully guarded from the general public since some skeptics when admitted act more like a drunken bull in a china shop than human beings. Ignorant and bigoted people fail to understand these miracles. When they do manage to get in a seance through the influence of some personal friend, they often get scared to death when the many white-robed spirits begin to come, and going into hysterics, thus breaking up the seance or injuring the spirit battery, etc. The writer has seen and talked with a recently deceased mother who passed into the next world some months ago. In one case she fully materialized at my feet, fifteen feet from the cabinet. Other people have had similar experiences. I will say that I attended nearly forty seances, however, before any of my spirit relatives could control the forces well enough to come to me, although many other abler spirits have repeatedly made a "dash for the North Polo," (so to speak), and have repeatedly brought messages, etc., from that almost unknown region—the next world. The story of those who were unable to break through the barriers between the two worlds would fill a book. But that thousands have either personally manifested or got through perfectly authentic messages is generally admitted by all those who have made an honest, thorough examination of the facts.

AN OCCULT POWER POSSESSED BY FEW

Birds Trained by the Subtile Force of Angelic Kindness.

THE LITTLE SONGSTERS OF THE AIR TAUGHT TO CLUSTER AROUND THEIR TEACHERS AND PROTECTORS—TRAINED TO SAVE COTTON—A DIVINE LESSON IMPARTED TO THOSE WHO MURDER BIRDS.

To the Editor:—As set forth in the Chicago Chronicle in a communication from Fairland, Tex., for many years the boll worm has been the curse of the cotton planters in the South. In some regions large areas of cotton, giving promise of an abundant yield, have been utterly ruined in a few days by this pest, that seemed to march in solid phalanx devouring everything in its pathway.

At last it looks as if a remedy for the boll worm evil has been discovered, and it is so simple that everybody is wondering why someone has not thought of it before. It has been left for a plain, uneducated Western rancher, assisted by his wife, both of whom are endowed with angelic qualities, to make a discovery worth millions to the people of the Southern States, where scientists and entomologists have failed after years of study and many costly experiments. This Texas farmer has come to the rescue of the cotton planter with an effectual remedy against boll worms. Boll means "sharpshooters" and all other insects that prey upon and destroy growing cotton.

G. B. Boswell has just demonstrated to the distressed ranchers in the vicinity of Fairland that he has found a way to protect their cotton from the pests that have been destroying the crops for several years. He does not call his method a discovery, since, he says, he has only used and trained and directed nature's own divine forces against one of the most insatiate and destructive enemies that the Southern farmer has ever encountered.

FLOCKS OF WHITE WINGS.

Boswell and his young wife own a small ranch near Presidio, on the Rio Grande. They were on their way to the Brazos River country, where it is reported that the boll worms are destroying the cotton crop, and were induced to stop for a short time in the Colorado Valley. Mr. Boswell and his wife are accompanied by nearly 2,000 small birds of two varieties. Just think of that, Spiritualists, God's songsters taught a useful lesson! About 1,500 are white-winged sparrows, natives of Western Texas and New Mexico. The remainder of the flock is composed of Mexican canaries. Just at daylight one morning 800 or 1,000 of the birds were turned loose upon a field of cotton of twenty acres. Swarms of the little winged pests that are supposed to mother the boll worm could be seen hovering over the field, while hideous looking bugs with snouts ending in a miniature lance literally covered the leaves and stems of the plants.

A flood of white wings descended among the dying cotton, the birds filling the air with chirps of battle. When a fly arose there was a glitter of white feathers, followed by a chirp of triumph as the bird seized and ground the mother of a million of boll worms between its sharp mandibles.

Mr. Boswell and his wife walked about through the cotton patch, each carrying a large pan containing a liquid of rich fragrance, which is one of the secrets of their business. The public has not been made acquainted with the ingredients of this sweet-smelling mixture. The birds are fond of it, and they flew to the pans every few minutes, chirping with great glee and acting as if exhilarated and intoxicated with the joy of battle.

DID THEIR WORK THOROUGHLY.

After the birds had worked for a little more than an hour Mrs. Boswell returned to camp and turned the remainder of the flock loose upon the plantation. The field is 440 yards in length and 220 in width. It took nearly three hours for the flock of birds to accomplish their work and they seemed to know when their task was finished. After hopping about on the fence for a few moments they began to fly back to the camp, where they held high carnival in the trees. Many of them went straight into a great cage and composed themselves, as if seeking rest. Others, apparently the younger birds, sought either to ease or win favors from their mistress. A flock followed her from place to place as she moved about the camp, often perching upon her head and shoulders and filling the grove with the sweet spiritual melody of their triumphant songs.

Farmers who had walked over the field after the birds retired reported that they found few of the pests remaining.

"I will go over it again," said the owner of the birds, "and I would almost be willing to give a nickel apiece for every insect you find after we finish."

Mr. Boswell is a printer by trade. He was raised on a farm and from his boyhood has been a passionate lover of birds, a grand and beautiful attribute of his nature. During his newspaper career he made what he calls a scrap book of ornithological information. Three or four years ago, while prowling through Old Mexico in search of rare specimens, he met Senorita Flores Seramo, who was also a lover of birds. This mutual sentiment led to a friendship which resulted in matrimony.

The young couple selected a favorable location in a sparsely settled region far out on the Rio Grande, where they built a cabin and set to work to collect and domesticate various species of wild birds. Hardly six months passed before they owned a large flock of quail and a hundred or more chaparrel birds that were as tame as chickens. In the course of a short time they had 400 or 500 Mexican canaries and white-winged sparrows living contentedly in cages, and many of them were so gentle that they could be trusted to take little trips in the open air. In the course of time these enthusiastic bird fanciers built a large aviary in their yard, and by patient, careful training they succeeded in fostering a large colony of little birds that could be trusted to go and come like tame pigeons.

A YEAR'S TRAINING REQUIRED.

Last summer Mr. Boswell and his wife began to train a large flock of their birds to make short journeys from home. "The first night we stopped at a strange place," said Senora Flores, "the little fellows were scared nearly to death. Many of them would not leave my chair to perch on the temporary roost we made about the wagon. I had to sit and sing and talk to them nearly all night." What a beautifully divine picture that!

Finally they succeeded in coaxing the flock as far as General Trevino's ranch in Old Mexico, where there was a field of cotton that had been attacked by insects. The experiment proved a success, and after a few days spent in training the flocks to follow the ornithologists from place to place Mr. Boswell and his wife returned to their home.

The bird ranch, which is now called the "Hacienda de la Pfuma," is one of the most picturesque and interesting possessions in Texas. It is fenced with twelve strands of barbed wire, which makes the inclosure proof against all intruders, including small animals. The well-painted buildings are located in a large grove of trees, through which flow several small streams of water, that are conducted from a great spring that flows from the side of a mountain fifty yards away. The whole grove appears to rise from a bed of flowers of every hue.

Mr. and Mrs. Boswell have other schemes for utilizing birds that they do not care to disclose at this early period of their career. One of these, however, is no secret. Mr. Boswell thinks that if every farmer in the United States owned a few chaparrel birds that snakes and other smaller reptiles would soon be as scarce in this country as they are in Ireland. These great snake killers are the easiest birds domesticated of all the feathered tribe, and they are so hardy that they will prosper in the snow lands or on scorching deserts.

These beautiful birds are entitled to immortality; entitled to a home in spirit life.

EXCELSIOR.

SCHOOL AND CAMP.

Morris Pratt Institute and Waukesha.

To the Editor:—Just at this time I am exceedingly anxious that your readers may know that Wisconsin Spiritualists are not discouraged or falling behind in their efforts to place Spiritualism fairly before the people.

The Morris Pratt Institute will soon become an important factor in this end, if the believers in education and the development of our spiritual and mental gifts will co-operate with us.

Frankly we ask Spiritualists to aid us financially, and with voice and pen to advertise the work we aim to accomplish. It has been well said that if we intend to do anything toward making the world better, the time to do so is now. Therefore do not put off until tomorrow the duties that come with today, for this opportunity to do good may not come to you again.

Send your offerings to Mrs. Clara L. Stewart, Whitewater, Wis., and she will place your name upon the roll of honor with those who live and hope and work for the good of humanity.

Our camp-meeting at Waukesha will open early in August, and everything points toward a large and successful gathering.

Among the speakers and mediums engaged, are many with a national reputation, while beautiful Waukesha, with her health-giving springs and boating, bathing and fishing, with free concerts daily, at her attractive parks, assures a program to please all, whether in search of spiritual instruction, or upon pleasure bent. While the five to ten thousand transient people at Waukesha, and the three hundred thousand at near-by Milwaukee, assures a large attendance and abundant patronage. So come and abide with us, and partake of the good things provided for you.

INSPIRATION AND RESPONSIBILITY.

Inspiring me, from Summer-Land,
I sense a power divinely grand;
It fills my mind with newest thought,
Beyond the All the Past had caught;
And yet this power entranceth not
With visioned scene, or living thought
Of other world than this of Earth,
E'en though 'tis sense of higher birth.

I am inspired with life as man,—
I am inspired with better plan,—
Where man as man obtains a place,
That far exceeds the law of race.
It is this earth I would transform,
And lift it out of all this storm
Of selfish greed, until in grace
I see the God in human face!

Am I inspired? 'Tis I, alone;
Myself must lay the corner-stone,
Of Faith's new temple—man's new home—
E'en though from angel visions come!
It is my faith, that urges on;
But by my work, the thing is done,
If it be done, as prophecy
Proclaims it will—some other day!

Know I of God? In mystic way,
I know of immortality;
But most of all, of man I know;
And of this life of now, below.
Here is my place, my work is here,
E'en though I am a priest or seer,
And this, the reason why I stand
Upon my feet, on sea or land!

The angel tells of what must be;
But lo! he leaves the work to me;
And proving faith, I labor on,
Until this manly life is done.
I quote the word of poet true;
Recall his vision unto view:
"Wings for the angels; feet for the men
Our feet must rise, or we fall again"—
And thus confirm this world of mine,
That we must be the Life Divine;
It is transformed, this world of ours,
From noxious weeds to fruits and flowers!

EDITH.

She was only 14 and a victim of consumption. Her name was Edith Miller—I suppose that is her name in the angel world.

Her mother writes: "1898. We cannot make it seem possible that the New Year can bring us any joy. Our Edith died December 14th. She went peacefully;—a slight coughing spell, a small flow of blood, and she fell back in her mother's arms, beyond our reach.

"She was dressed for her last reception in a sweet little gown with plenty of flannels, and lain on what seemed to be a beautiful, white satin couch. Over her was thrown an exquisite blue flannel blanket. The parlor was filled with flowers. She is now lying in a vault kindly offered by a friend, and we go every day to see her."

Thinking to turn the thoughts of the stricken family from earth to heaven, these verses were written:

'Tis winter here, the fields are bare,
The song-birds gone, the blossoms dead;
There seems no beauty anywhere
Save gleams from memory's garden shed.
But in The-Far-away of souls
Such dreary weather does not come;
The Queen of Summer days controls
In Edith's heavenly home.

While we are chilling, cut by winds,
As merciless as unseen knives,
The zephyrs murmur, all sweet kinds,
In the warm lands where Edith lives.
Her friends, the angels float about
Beneath the softest azure dome,
And bring her things we do without—
O, Edith's heavenly home.

Her kindred angels—they are there
To balm her when she longs for love,
And give our Heaven-born darling care
In that strange country up above.
They love the very ones she loves,
They dwelt once in some earthly home,
They tell her as she talks and moves,
"How blessed you are come!"

Additional Proof of Spirit Return.

To the Editor:—For the past two years I have been very much interested in spirit pictures. It is a phase of the great phenomena which is very convincing and you have it ever with you. I have secured some beautiful pictures produced in my presence through those remarkable mediums, the Bangs Sisters. I have had some spirit photographs taken through the mediumship of Mr. W. M. Keeler, of Washington, including a fine likeness of Miss Frances Willard, taken in the evening while a strong gas light burned in the room.

During the latter part of June I spent a few days at the Spiritual Camp at Bankson's Lake, Michigan, where I met Mr. Frank N. Foster, the spirit photographer of Grand Rapids, Michigan. Desiring very much to secure a photograph of my dear father, who passed to a higher life about eight years ago in New Jersey, I made an appointment with Mr. Foster. The gallery was a rude shanty where the oars were kept for the boats. Two sheets were hung up forming a background, no paraphernalia was there but an ordinary camera. I sat down, "looked pleasant" and in a twinkling of an eye I was "took."

Mrs. Augusta Ferris, the medium, was present, and Mr. Foster asked us to come to the camera, each placing a hand on it for about half a minute.

I was very much pleased when I received my picture, mailed me on my return to Chicago. I found a number of spirit faces on the picture, and directly above my head a fine and perfect likeness of father. Neither of the two who were present when I sat had ever seen him, nor any picture of him, nor had I one with me.

How came he there?

Thought is a mighty factor but it cannot take shape to be taken up and reproduced on the sensitive plate. I have been reading Mr. T. J. Hudson's articles published in several of our leading papers lately. His objective and subjective minds can do wonders according to his ideas. It may be that Mr. Foster could give Mr. Hudson a photograph of his two "selves" so he might see himself as others see him. Let him, or others who can, explain this wonderful phenomenon.

I am satisfied that it is a strong and positive proof of spirit return, and am glad that they can take on form so as to be recognized by us.

Neither Mr. Hudson or any of us can speak except as we see and understand within; the blind cannot lead the blind, and try hard as he may, friend Hudson cannot improve on infinite perfection.

If we will earnestly seek the truth and keep our minds receptive as little children, the truth will be revealed to us; farther we cannot look and higher we cannot climb, but the truth shall make us free. Yours very truly,

Chicago, Ill. LAURA G. FIXEN.

A WONDERFUL MEDIUM.

Walks Barefoot on White-Hot Rocks.

MARVELLOUS FEAT OF A FIJIAN WHO PROFESSES SUPERNATURAL POWERS—WEIRD CORONATION CEREMONIES IN SUVA—THOUSANDS WITNESS AN EXHIBITION THAT LOOKS TO BE IMPOSSIBLE.

Honolulu, July 3.—In no part of the broad British domain, as set forth in the New York World, were there weirder ceremonies in connection with the coronation of Edward VII., probably, than in Suva, the capital of the Crown colony of Fiji. The coronation festivities there lasted a week—the Polynesian counts the importance of a celebration by the length of time it lasts. Mingled with church services and children's entertainments, boat racing and horse racing, dinners by His Excellency the Administrator, and a grand ball at the Administrator's official residence, was a grand exhibition of the ceremony of Vilavillatrevo, or the Polynesian fire-walking.

This ceremony attracted chiefs and people from all parts of Fiji. It was given a prominent place on the program of the celebration. It took place near the Government House and was attended by His Excellency the Administrator, Mr. Allardyce and nearly all the government officials of the colony and most of the leading white residents. It was performed by an old native Fijian, known as Kuveni, much venerated for his supposed supernatural powers even among the proselytes of the Wesleyan Church, the leading religious denomination in Fiji, whose membership is numerous enough to furnish a choir of 500 voices in the vocal parts of the coronation celebration.

PREPARING FOR FIRE WALKING.

The ceremony took place on the evening of June 25. Careful preparation had been made for it. On the grounds near the Government House a deep trench or hole about twenty feet long, twelve feet wide and eight feet deep was dug, and early in the forenoon of the day of the ceremony this was filled nearly full of keawl wood, cut in cordwood lengths. This is the customary firewood of Fiji, and burns with an intense heat. Upon this keawl wood were piled an immense quantity of lava rocks, varying in size from that of a good-sized watermelon to that of a bushel basket.

The quantity of the rocks or stones was so adjusted that when the cordwood had well burned down the rocks would fill the pit nearly to the level of the surrounding ground. The cordwood was lighted shortly before noon, so as to thoroughly heat the stones by nine o'clock at night, at which time the ceremony was to take place. Around this pit on all four sides at a distance from its edge of about twelve feet were arranged seats for the spectators, of whom there were several thousand. Electric lights were provided to make the ceremony clearly visible to all.

By nine o'clock the mass of stones was at a white heat, except a few of those around the edges of the pit. Kuveni, the fire-walker, attended by native chiefs, approached the fiery pit clad in a sort of lawi-lawi, or short skirt, of white cotton cloth. Over this he wore a somewhat longer skirt, made of the ti plant, strung on a girdle about his waist and hanging loosely down. On his head he wore a sort of loose chaplet, also made of ti leaves, the leaves hanging down over his body and shoulders, covering them pretty well. He wore no other garments. His feet were entirely bare, and, though the soles of his feet were thick and horny from having gone barefooted all his life, he used no preparation of any kind on them. In his hands he carried a bundle of ti leaves loosely tied up into a sort of sheaf, the ends of the leaves falling freely out from the retaining cords at one end. As he approached the fiery pit men with long pieces of wood stirred the stones till their white, almost molten, undersides were turned uppermost, and from the center of the pit glowed a white hot oven in the electric light.

WALKS ON WHITE-HOT STONES.

First reciting in a loud monotone an ancient Fijian form of incantation, Kuveni first struck the stones at the edge of the pit with his bundle of ti leaves, and then, advancing slowly, crossed through the center of the pit, raising and lowering and swinging his bunch of ti leaves from one side of him to another as he did so.

Uttering a second incantation, he recrossed the hot rocks again, going right through the center of the pit where the stones were the hottest. This he repeated seven times, crossing and recrossing in the same deliberate manner, repeating his incantations and swinging his bundle of ti leaves.

When he had concluded his ceremony the Fijians, in ecstasies of amazement and admiration, carried him bodily to the Government House, showering him with silver, seizing the ti leaves of his paraphernalia as mementoes and enchanted relics, and praying him for blessings on themselves and relatives or curses on his enemies.

An examination of Kuveni's feet at the instance of the Administrator, according to passengers from the steamship Moana, which arrived here yesterday, and who witnessed it, revealed no sign of burning or any effect of the fire or hot stones whatever. Flashlight pictures taken of the ceremony show the white light of the hot stones where his feet touched them in crossing the fiery pit.

The effect produced on the natives is described as something almost beyond exaggeration, and even on the whites who witnessed it a deep impression of its marvellousness was made.

READ AND REFLECT.

A View of the Universe of Mind and Matter.

To the Editor:—Reading and re-reading the deep, logical, common-sense lessons from the pen of Hudson Tuttle, J. S. Loveland, Nora Batchelor, Clara Watson, and many others of like mind, in your truly Progressive Thinker, has inspired me to venture a brief manuscript on a slightly different but parallel line of investigation.

As I have on former occasions endeavored to sketch life's line from a rather obscure point of view, we will now move around into a clearer light and take notes from an advantageous position. To us who reason and investigate along these lines it is a self-evident fact that the universe is a vast electro-magno-chemical laboratory containing all the ingredients of energy and matter, and that planets are merely temporal phenomenal points of attraction and generation. Planets are just as much a natural growth from seed germs, as are pumpkins or mortals. In fact every life animated phenomenon that is or ever was, is or was, the inevitable result of involved principles of the germ which materialized said phenomenal form.

To gain a clearer understanding of this matter, let us get back of the beginning of our home planet. Before earth's germinal conception where was earth's vast body of matter, its mountains of rocks, its mines of minerals, chemicals and medicaments, its myriads of complex functional forces which have veiled its landscape in forest and stream and gladdened the galaxy with industry and intellect, if it was not a diffuse ingredient afloat in ether's boundless reservoir, similarly as ingredients for the next growth of vegetable and mineral phenomena now float in earth's atmosphere.

It is nonsense to assume that vegetation draws either its growth or medical properties from the soil. Take a cup of soil for a battery—analyze it, weigh it, keep it moist with pure water and in it grow several varieties of plants ranging in medical properties from the deadly poisonous nightshade to the mildly palliative lettuce, then re-analyze and re-weigh your soil to find analysis or weight but little if any disturbed.

To us tiny mortals our little planet seems a huge institution to come from a seed germ, but perhaps the tiny mite that dwells in the bark of the forest oak has never thought of his great unexplored world being the inevitable result of a seed-germ. But planet germs are as maturally the result of matured planets, as worm germs are of matured oaks. And planet germs are as naturally endowed with involved functional possibility to generate their aural atmosphere, their specific lines of phenomena, and endow each line with its quota of physical and mental possibility from their surrounding elements as are the acorn germs to generate their aura, their sap, bark, wood, buds, leaves, blossoms and acorns, and endow each with life and involved functional possibility for future generation within the more genial elements of earth's aural atmosphere.

The two primal ingredients of the universe might be termed energy and element, i. e., life and matter, and their modus operandi of co-operation is strictly reciprocal Energy vitalizing the function, while functional influence enforces activity and intellectual advancement.

The universe and each phenomenon is just as natural and just as simply the result of immutable functional forces vitalized by intellective energy as is the mortal form with its complex physical and mental functions vitalized by billions of mites of slightly intelligized energy.

So we find universe within universe, and function within function—each function through enforced activity and experience forcing individualized energy from lower to higher functional responsibility. Here we catch the first glimpse of Infinite Intelligence.

Immortality—Oh, yes, I am well aware I am advancing into miry ground, nor have I the least idea of trying to cross the bog. I merely wish to step out onto the edge and shake up the thin sod that theorists have propagated and so long nourished. You see it is so much easier to simply assert that human individuality is of eternal duration than it would be to establish some way stations away out along its evolutional march where it must side-track and be condemned a non-entity. But honestly, to my shallow finite mind eternity becomes an incomprehensible stretch of time. The fact that death does not end conscious individuality can be admitted, only as corroborative evidence of eternal individuality, for in rebuttal we might very logically contend that the simple fact that billions of planets are perpetually occupied in generating and sending off fresh energy to replace the ever ascending energy, is at least very strong presumptive evidence that there is waning at the other end of the line. Fire makes steam and the steam vitalizes the remotest mechanical function in the shop. But why perpetually fire if energy once set in motion were eternal? Individualized energy vitalizes every function in the universe but why perpetually generate if energy once individualized and sent forth be eternal? But, be that as it may—if final dissolution—why, then the event is so forestalled in the misty future that mortals can ill afford to fret about it.

When we take a drop of water and find in it a world for myriad living creatures; a grain of sand and find its caves, holes and crevices the living abode of families of animalcules, find the human organism a veritable beehive in industry wherein billions upon billions of miniature creatures are incessantly playing chemistry, navigation, commerce and transportation in their co-operative traffic of digesting and distributing food stuff throughout the various physical and mental avenues of their little mercantile world, each functional gang attending strictly to their functional duty, much the same as the different mortal gangs pursue the industrial and educational department of our broader commercial world. Then we begin to wonder how much of individualized energy lies below mortal observation, climbing the ladder to prominence by means of functional rounds, and still that which is below mortal vision is but a drop from the ocean as compared to that which surrounds us, but is attuned above our mortal vision. That was a brilliant scheme of nature which renders (except under chance abnormal influence) the life entities occupying one department unseen and unsensed by entities occupying a differently attuned department. Said scheme decrees that infinitesimals must die, or rather become lost, to the infinitesimal family in coalescing as factors in the molecule and arising to molecular attunement; molecules become lost to the molecule family in coalescing in the monad and rising to monadic attunement; monads become lost to the monad family in coalescing as factors in mortal organism, and mortals die to the mortal family by passing under higher functional attunement ere they become full fledged entities. Imagine for one moment the dilemma of mortals could they see and sense all the infinitesimals, all the molecules, monads and human entities that swarm in our atmosphere and if seen and sensed by us would render the earth-plane a seething, blinding mass of individualized energy.

And right here we run up against this all important fact in evolution—should molecules actually die—disintegrate, instead of augmenting and coalescing as factors in the more potent monad entity, then there would be no monadic energy evolved to vitalize the functions which denominate monadic energy, therefore no higher type of life than vegetation generated upon our planet, and earth's mission as a generator of its quota of higher intelligence would become a miserable failure.

Now, if, as we have shown, each function of evolution is dependent upon the next below for its output of finished, individualized energy as a vitalizing force then we must ask what would be the effect upon the high functions of our planet and of the still higher functions which generate and supervise systems of suns and planets should mortal death dissipate earth's most potent intellectual factor—the human entity? Well, the result would be earth's mission would prove a one-sided game to the higher functional department—the force and wisdom expenditure to generate and functionally equip it without reciprocal return.

Let us use a few lines in involcing souls and fixing their relative potency as evolutional factors. The soul of the molecule is the compromise expression of all the differently differentiated infinitesimals comprised in its unity. The soul of the monad is the compromise expression of all the differently differentiated molecules comprised in its organization. The soul of the human entity is the compromise expression of billions upon billions of differently differentiated monads coalesced in its unity organism, and the soul of the universe is the compromise-expression of all that is or ever was generated within. And here we sense the modus operandi of Infinite Intelligence alias God, alias Jehovah, Jove, Allah, Baal, Brahm, etc. Oh, thou genial relic of misplaced adoration and horror! How exquisitely grand and yet how infinitely diffused, how wonderfully diversified in functional potency! Ah! we find that one of the same bunch of keys which unlock the fathomless archives and bids the slumbering ingredients of energy and matter step forth and float in earth's magnetic breeze; dance in the lightning flash and drill in the cyclone; marshal its force and paint earth's hill and dale in vegetable and forest hue; redouble its forces and animate the scene with a floating panorama of wiggling, whirling, swimming, crawling, flying, roaming, thinking, reasoning, aspiring intuitive creatures; unlocks the mortal casket and bids the incarnate entity move on whether it wills or no. Not with a pledge of reward for good deeds done—not with a threat of retaliation for bad. Evolution's solemn edict "Move On," is all-sufficient, well knowing the same code of forces which has ever correctly placed each molecule and monad in crossing earth's plain will drop each human entity into the niche to which heredity, aspiration, opportunity and development combined have attuned it.

Friends, we assure you that clear outside of and independent of all so-called spirit phenomena both ancient and modern, the science of life evolution clearly demonstrates the true purpose of human entities as factors in the economy of functional forces only begins at mortal death and all this variegated abnormous jumble termed spirit phenomena only corroborates the evidence adduced from bed-rock scientific investigation clearly verifying the existence of both—a material functional department vitalized by mortal energy and an ethereal functional department vitalized by excarnate human energy; also demonstrates the close proximity of these two allied functions, their semblance, the possibility of abnormally mixing or blending the influence of these two closely attuned functions so as to over shadow entities belonging on either side of the so-called dead line.

Little by little, through earnest aspiration, the high and still higher attuned perception attained by modern scientists has enabled them to burrow beneath the rubbish of theologasters and grasp the long hidden key to life's mystery. Therefore as the human mind ponders upon nature's genial face and studies well her diversified expressions, thereby raising its attunement to higher and higher functions of intuition, then ponderous volumes of authentic details will supplant our weak, vague newspaper glimmerings; then the people of those generations will look back with derision upon our simple child-like credulity in squandering our best emotions upon Santa Claus, Gods and Saviors; just as we in our self-exalted egotism look back with aspersion upon the crude ideas of creation and environments entertained by the flat world generations. Those crude, narrow-minded people were just what they were by virtue of gross, muffled perceptive attunement. Our generation is just what it is by virtue of slightly higher and clearer perceptive attunement.

Earnest, persistent aspiration for absolute truth and absolute justice are the instruments of higher perceptive attunement, consequently we must add, Re-read and Reflect; study well nature's genial modus operandi. Scan broadly; do not limit your observation and intuition to our little grain of sand and that which mortal eye sees thereon, nor your mentality to the wily, scheming, deceptive legendary compiled by priestly tyrants of the flat world ages, to hold and perpetuate their tribal authority. Think outwardly, progressively; don't turn around at thirty-five or forty, crawl back into your shell and live over and over your own little unimportant past lives lamenting your missed affinities and lost opportunities; gloating over your shrewd business schemes and good "hoss swaps," your political and army achievements profusely interspersed with rehearsals of treasured funds of light anecdotes and silly puns, for that's the very way the poor little animalcule lives and dies in abject ignorance of our broader world.

THE BIBLE CHEMICALLY ANALYZED.

A Great Paper Steps to the Front to Do It.

As fully set forth in the New York Sun: Because of the passing away of the old-time "familiarity with the English Bible," the National Educational Association, in session at Minneapolis last week, passed a resolution expressive of its "hope" and wish that public sentiment would permit the Bible "to be read and studied" in the public schools generally, but simply "as a literary work of the highest and purest type, side by side with the poetry and prose which it has inspired and in large part formed."

This association would not have the Bible treated as a "theological book merely," of supreme religious authority, but only as "a masterpiece of literature." For that very reason, however, the study it advises would be without avail even for the secular purpose of giving purely literary instruction; and its introduction would be opposed not less earnestly than was the purely perfunctory reading of passages from the Bible with which the daily sessions of State schools usually were once opened. Of course, children gave little heed to the readings; yet even that slight attention to the Bible provoked both religious and infidel opposition. An attempt now to introduce the formal and careful study of the Bible, though as "a literature" only, would arouse still more violent resistance from both those camps.

Undoubtedly the English Bible is a literary treasure house of incomparable value in the preservation of pure and strong English speech. In a literary sense it is the best of the versions which are retained in the popular usage of the world. The Bible was never printed complete in England until 1538, yet its influence on our language and literature has been far more profound than that of any other book, or than that of any other translation on the literature and thought of the people of any other speech for whom it was made. Familiarity with the Bible has been more intimate among English-speaking people than among any other. Its language has been on every tongue. It lies at the very foundation of English literature; but its pre-eminence as "the Book" has not been due to any mere literary supremacy. It has been lifted up to its sole elevation by the awe with which it was regarded as "the Word of God," as the one and only book which came from heaven itself for the eternal guidance of man.

The very suggestion that now the Bible should be read and taught simply as "a masterpiece of literature," wholly apart from any religious character, put forth, as it is, from a nominally Christian and Protestant source, is significant of a change of spirit which cannot be called less than revolutionary in its significance. A suggestion from a Christian source that the Bible be degraded from its place of supreme elevation as "the Book," and the "Word of God," to the category of the human words of Milton and Shakespeare as merely a masterpiece of the literary expression of a single race, would once have aroused the whole English-speaking world, believing and infidel, as a momentous surrender of pivotal religious position. Now it is taken as a matter of course.

Simply as a text book in English literature, the Bible would prove of little value in the public schools, even if religious opposition to its use was silenced. The schools are already overloaded with studies, to the great confusion of the minds of children. To be of any literary service the new method of teaching the Bible would have to be pursued so thoroughly that a radical transformation in the whole curriculum would be made, necessary. Moreover our public school teachers, well fitted as they may be to conduct the ordinary routine of elementary study, are conspicuously incompetent for this purely literary instruction. Their weakest point is on the literary side. Nor would the impression produced on children by the Bible be deep and permanent, as it has been on our race, if the singular sacred supremacy of the book was not also taught by the teacher. As "a literature" merely, as man's book and not God's Book, it would be only a dry and tiresome study for the pupils. Its appeal to their imagination, to their sense of wonder, to their awe, would be gone if it was not presented to them as a supernatural production.

The reason for the present greatly diminished familiarity with the Bible is obvious. The later criticism has removed from the Bible the supernatural distinction which made it the English literary treasure house, for without deep religious faith in the Bible as the one veritable message of God to man it could never have reached and maintained the place of supremacy in our literature. Its vigorous English alone would never have preserved it as a book for the popular study and as a source of literary wealth. If it had only that excellence to recommend it, the Bible would have become, long ago, a practically obsolete book so far as concerns people who were religious and philological and merely literary students. Its life has been only in the vitality of the religious faith to which it was the "Word of God."

In a baccalaureate sermon preached not long ago to college students in this city, a preacher of a church whose sole foundation is supernatural Biblical authority spoke of the Bible as a book "through which runs a thread of myth and legend." And no one in his very orthodox audience seemed surprised. The Bible is practically a fairy book in this modern pulpit conception; and under one guise or another of evasive language and illogical conclusion the teaching of a large part of our theological schools leads to that conception; but the popular taste prefers to get its myths and legends from other and more amusing sources. If people do not go to the Bible for their religion they will not go to it at all.

That the old familiarity with the Bible has been lost by this generation is very apparent in both current speech and writing. Quotations which formerly came to the tongue of every speaker, whether religious believer or unbeliever, because embalmed in their memory by early study of the Scriptures, are heard no longer, except from people of the older generation, and their source and application are not understood by contemporary audiences. Sunday schools, according to official statistics, continue to include a great part of the children of Protestants, but actually, in New York, at least, they are not the flourishing institutions they once were, unless it be as philanthropic enterprises among the poor, as "mission" schools. How large is the part of the children of Fifth avenue, and of the districts of New York generally where fashion resides, who attend Sunday schools and are drilled in the Bible?

People hear passages of the Scripture read as lessons in the churches on Sunday, but they listen to them only perfunctorily. The aestheticism of the services appeals to them more powerfully. Even Protestant churches which have always rejected forms of appeal to the sense as a pagan superstition are now importing vested choirs and musical litanies into their services, as a cover behind which to hide poverty of belief in the Bible as the sole authority for their faith.

The mere adoption of the Bible as a text book in schools, on the ground that it is "a masterpiece of literature," will be powerless to check this revolutionary tendency, the most remarkable in the whole history of Christianity.

Dream Phenomena.

To prove that outside sounds influence dreams, I will relate one dream I had a few days ago. I lay down on the sofa and soon went to sleep. By and by I began to dream that I was a performer in a theatre, and I thought that this night the show was going to start earlier than usual. I was on the street, and the manager called me in, telling me to get ready to do my turn. I was ready to go on, but there seemed to be some trouble with the orchestra, as one of the violinplayers was continually picking on the strings of his violin, and it sounded more like some one tuning a banjo than a violin. I was beginning to feel annoyed because the orchestra did not start playing, and still that violin player was picking away. Then everything seemed to be adjusted, and the orchestra was about to begin when a lady entered the room and the noise awakened me. I asked her if there had been some kind of a tapping noise made just before I was awakened. She said: "There has been a gasolene launch going by." Just then I heard the launch.

Now I do not believe that I was asleep more than five or ten minutes. Very likely it was the puffing of the launch that caused the whole dream. When I awakened the puffing sound had ceased. But it recommenced after I was awake a few seconds; and I could easily distinguish the same duration between the puffs and between the pickings of the violinist. Now as the engine was stopped just before I awakened, that must have been the reason the picking ceased; and the orchestra was all in readiness to play. The dream was quite vivid, and took place in broad daylight. How strange that the sound of a gasolene engine should call up the idea of an orchestra in a theatre.

Do animals dream? I have watched sleeping cats many times; sometimes I have seen them shake, stick out their tongue, and move their paws and whiskers, just as if in their dreams they were either pursuing a mouse or fleeing from Towser. If I caused them to awaken, they would draw in their tongue, stretch themselves and go to sleep again, only to renew their actions. They must dream, or why would they do as I have described above?

Do animals see in their waking state things which are out of range of human eyes? Some writers claim they do. We all know that many animals have remarkable powers of perception, call it instinct, or what you may. If animals see things in the waking state that man does not ordinarily see, is it not possible that they see some of these things in their dreams?

It is a popular belief among some people, that dogs will howl if anyone is about to die. Are the dogs clairvoyant? Do they see the gathering spirit friends, ready to receive the soul about to enter spirit life?

There are many strange things on this earth, and, although the mental states of man are extensively studied, would it not be well for psychologists and others to give a larger share of attention to the manifestations of the intelligence of animals?

The Religion of Cheer.

To cultivate a cheerful spirit, to enjoy all that is good and pleasant in our surroundings, should be a matter of duty with us all.

To diffuse sunshine around us should be our aim, thus making our lives a blessing to others; they in turn passing this cheer to others, and they still passing it on until all along the line there shall radiate the light of serene cheerfulness, whatever the experience of individuals may be.

Not that this earthly life of ours can always be perfectly joyous in an exuberant way, but underlying all human experiences, all outward manifestations, there may be an inward serenity, a perfect peace, based on unfaltering trust: "That good will take the final place of ill."

In the end, either here or hereafter, Right will everlastingly triumph over Wrong and Might shall give place to Right.

To have been endowed with life here on this earthly plane is of itself sufficient to make us realize it as a blessing, and if we possess benevolent impulses, as well born and well kept individuals ought to have, we will desire that others of our kind may find life a blessing as well as ourselves.

There is religion in it—to enjoy this life as a gift from the Source of All Life. To make the most of its opportunities, to enjoy in the highest and best sense, all its pure pleasures and blessings.

It is not the earth or the world which is at fault that there is discord and hate, vice and sin here; but we, the people, are to blame who turn that which was designed as blessings (and which should be such) into evil, inharmony, and unhappiness. All wrong, all unnecessary, all to be deplored is this!

Human life is of itself a desirable gift; but alas! it has too often been corrupted into evil, we must acknowledge.

When these untoward conditions are traced back to their earliest manifestations, we shall find the wrong doings of one or two progenitors have forged a chain that, link by link, has fettered human lives through generations.

We shall see that it is this, which has enslaved a host of mendicant criminals, and poor innocent victims of wrong. These hapless ones confront the philanthropist and the reformer, appealing to them for personal help, for justice, and for sympathy.

But all this does not invalidate the truth that this earthly life of ours was designed and should be a blessing to humanity.

Let us accept it as such, and where there are those more unfortunately circumstanced than ourselves, see that we fail not to render them help and sympathy, and cheer. In thus helping others, we will be making our own lives happier and better, as we go on towards the other and higher side of existence.

THE OPTIMISTIC LIFE.

Optimism the Regenerator of Our World.

Optimism is the coming regenerator of our world. While it is realized to a certain extent by some people, to the majority only glimpses are caught occasionally, and by the pessimist it is classed as wholly meaningless.

To live the optimistic life we should be able to make our so-called duties a pleasure and privilege. Our seeming duties are our given opportunities thrown in our way as stepping-stones for our advancement.

By oiling the wheels of duty with love, we prevent friction, and cause them to run smoothly.

Each of us is placed in some position in life, and should do the duties of that position to the best of our ability. Our environments change our duties, and doing in the best way that duty which is ours at a specified time is doing our very best. If to do one's best at any given moment is possible—which will be freely admitted—then to do one best at all times is equally possible, provided we hold ourselves to the highest plane of right living and understanding.

Many of us hold the mistaken idea that we could do better and be happier elsewhere than where we happen to be placed. They see only the thorns, the drudgery and the disagreeable things in their own vocation, and only the flowers and the pleasant experiences in the vocation of others. They become so absorbed in what seems to them their neighbors' advantages, they let the golden opportunities in their own life slip by unheeded.

The wise man or woman, boy or girl, knows there are sorrows, struggles and unhappiness in every life, but out of these struggles we can emerge victorious, and take the higher position in life which these experiences have fitted us for.

Those who see only orderly progress in the universe, and are always thinking optimism, live in the vibrations of prosperity and progress.

No matter what the cynics and pessimists say, there is more love, more charity, more progress in the world today than ever before.

Some people are inclined to drift aimlessly through life, achieving nothing and becoming ill-natured and cross-grained, simply because they think there is nothing in this world for them to do. Being forced to work and forced to do our best breeds in us self-control, cheerfulness, strength of will, and many virtues that are unknown to the idle. It is not by great deeds alone, like those of martyrs, good is to be accomplished, but by living daily a true, virtuous life of self-sacrifice which leads to completion of life. This constitutes the bloom, the flower, the fruit; all else is rudimentary.

Build an optimistic world.

Crowd out of your world envy, inharmony, discord, fear, disorder, anger and hate, by introducing cheerfulness, hope, joy, harmony, peace and love.

Let us continually expand our world by unfolding ourselves.

Open our eyes wider to the beautiful sights in the universe.

Open our ears to the delightful and tender strains of divine music which comes through love, kindness, cheerfulness and contentment.

Open our nostrils to the exquisite perfume which permeates every nook and crevice of this grand universe. Indeed! Let our every thought be to build, construct, create a divine world of which poets, seers and sages dream and sing. Then our world will be beautiful and from day to day, week to week, month to month, year to year, through all eternity will become more beautiful—a beautiful world without end. The true optimist's world is indeed beautiful.

TWO PREACHERS.

Two preachers touched my soul one night;
Both woke within me earnest thought;
One charmed by fancy's airy flight,
One bitter anguish wrought.

The first, 'neath frescoed, fretted roof,
With flowers making sweet the air,
On ornate dais stood aloof,
And uttered praiseful prayer.

He thanked his God in mankind's name,
For light, for life, for home and friends,
For all that thro' our sensuous frame
A thrill of gladness sends.

And then he spoke, in choicest phrase,
Of fruitful earth and glorious heaven,
Of love that guardeth all our ways,
Of pardon freely given.

And, listening in a cushioned pew,
Wrapped in a dreamful, hazy mist
Of music, lights, and warmth, I grew
A sudden optimist.

Wealth, beauty, grace, and culture rare,
Proud faces, fashioned fair by fate,
Filled up the pews—no hint was there
Of misery, want, or hate.

The world was fair, and God did reign—
So ran my musings glad and sweet,
As at the organ's grand refrain
We surged into the street.

Into the street! 'Twas here I found
The preacher who spoke words of woe;
The stars shone fierce above—around
All things were draped in snow.

And bitter was the north wind's rage,
Yet thin-clad forms went hurrying on,—
Forms bent with toil, disease, and age,
From whom all joy seemed gone.

And baby faces begged for bread,
And voices rude made night more drear,
With oaths enforcing words of dread;
I wondered—was God near?

And maddened men went reeling by
To homes where wives, with inward moan,
Hushed childhood's quick, impatient cry,
And hunger's fretful tone.

And by the street-lamp's flickering glare
I glimpses caught of faces bold,—
Girl-faces, whose defiant stare
Their dismal story told.

From sights and sounds like these—not creeds—
Did this strange preacher preach to me,
His sermon was on human needs;
His name—Humanity!

And this is the moral that he drew:
That man for man in larger sense
Does what Heaven fails to do—
Becomes a loving Providence.

GIVES HIS SECRET TO THE WORLD.

A Remarkable Discovery By a Remarkable Man.

The Art of Fascinating, the Power of Charming, the Secrets of Personal Magnetism Fully and Completely Revealed at Last.

A Marvelous, Mysterious Force Which Gives Wonderful Mental and Physical Strength, Overcomes All Diseases; Enables You to Know the Secret Natures of Others and to Handle Them as You Please.

Professor R. F. Robertson, Psych. D., C. D., is the greatest living teacher of Personal Magnetism. He has astounded the scientists of the world. He has discovered a new system of developing and imparting magnetic force. He believes the great power he has discovered lies dormant in every individual. He guarantees you can master its strange secrets at your own home and perform wonders of which you never dreamed. You can know at a glance the secret natures, talents, weaknesses, strength and vices of every person you meet. You can quickly develop marvelous physical and mental power, overcome all diseases in yourself or others, banish pain and bad habits without drugs or surgery. Professor Robertson can read your secret nature and influence your thoughts, though a thousand miles away. He can teach you how to do the same. This may seem incredible, but he absolutely guarantees this result under a forfeiture of $1,000.00 in gold. The power of hypnotism, persuasion, threats and entreaties pales into insignificance when compared with the wonders of this mighty force.

Professor Robertson calls his new discovery the "Ki-Magi" System of Personal Influence. You do not have to have subjects upon which to practice. Professor Robertson's instructions are so plain and explicit that you can read them carefully and at once use this great power secretly to influence and control the thoughts and desires of any one you wish. You will be startled and mystified at the wonderful things you can do; you will be astounded at the amazing power that you can exercise over others. Prominent ministers of the gospel, lawyers and business men have mastered Professor Robertson's new system, and they give it their highest indorsement.

S. I. Yetter, of Middletown, Pa., says: "Your 'Ki-Magi' System of Personal Influence has brought me that success in business for which I have been looking. It is the magnet that controls; there is no guesswork about it—it is a scientific fact. It has taught me to know and control myself as well as others."

Mr. Joseph Steiner, 1100 Ninth street, N. W., Washington, D. C., writes: "In your 'Ki-Magi' System of personal Influence I have found what I have for years searched for in vain. It has changed the whole trend of thought and given my life a new meaning. I feel younger and stronger every day. I find in it the key to business success."

Mrs. A. B. Egert, of 502 Woodland avenue, Cleveland, Ohio, writes: "I do not see how any society woman can become a successful leader without a knowledge of the wonderful secrets imparted by the 'Ki-Magi' system."

Mr. George W. Howard, of 157 Beech street, Detroit, Mich., says: "By means of your 'Ki-Magi' system I have made some startling discoveries in the characters of my friends. It is far beyond my fondest expectations. It should be in the hands of every man and woman who wishes to achieve the greatest success in life."

We have just issued 8,000 copies of Professor Robertson's new book entitled "The Secret of Power." We propose to give these 8,000 copies away absolutely free to interested persons for the purpose of showing the startling possibilities of this great discovery. We want you to have one free. After you get one, tell your friend. He will want one also, but he must write at once if he gets in on our free distribution, as these books are going very fast. After 8,000 copies of this book are distributed everybody will want one. But they will cost money then. Remember, they cost you nothing now. The chapters reveal a new method in psychic and spiritual research. They show vivid glimpses of a stupendous moral cosmos that will supersede moral confusion, that only verifiable tenets can survive, and the childhood period of faith and fancy will be superseded by knowledge and facts.

JOYS BEYOND THE THRESHOLD A Sequel to The To-morrow of Death. By Louis Figuier. Translated from the French. The To-morrow of death was written to develop the idea of the principle of the permanence of the human soul after death, and its reincarnation in a chain of new beings, whose successive links are unrolled to the bosom of ethereal space. "Beyond the Threshold" continues on the same lines, enlarging and expanding the idea by reasons and considerations drawn from science and philosophy, claiming that the certainty of a new birth beyond our earthly end is the best means of arming ourselves against all weakness in the presence of death, and that the help offered by science and philosophy to that end is far superior to that of any of the existing religions. From beginning to end it is interesting, entertaining, instructive and fascinating, and whether one accepts it all or not, much will have been learned and much pleasure enjoyed in its perusal. Price, $1.25.

THE GOSPEL OF BUDDHA, According to Old Records. By Dr. Paul Carus. A translation made from Japanese, under the auspices of the Rev. Shaku Soyer, delegate to the Parliament of Religions. Was published in Japan. Price, $1.

THE PHILOSOPHY OF SPIRITUALISM.

It Embraces Whatever is Worthy in Every System.

NUMBER NINETEEN.

Sex Relation.

Seeing that some misunderstand and others purposely misrepresent Spiritualism in its attitude regarding this most delicate and important social relation, let me further enlarge on the principle dealt with in the preceding number.

In the first place, to get at the truth we must view the question as natural, and the subject as clean, and the desire as pure, as any stirring the human mind to action. Neither false modesty nor sophistry can hide our nakedness any more than fig leaves from the inscrutable. The desire for intimacy with the other sex is as natural and pure as the desire of a babe for milk, and of all wonders it is the greatest, that men and women who owe their very existence to this desire, and who honor their parents, should be ashamed of the process of coming into life. All great men who were "head and shoulders" above the common have been noted for the unabashed and reasonable calmness with which they considered this question, and we will never get the right of it in thought or action until we learn to view the question as sane and orderly.

The institution of marriage as we know it must endure on the ground that it tends to prevent a transgression of the law of love or magnetic attraction or spiritual affinity in this tender relationship—from "undue influence" or brutal lust; or it must be abolished because under a fictitious sanctity and a spurious respectability it may degenerate into a conventional institution for setting at naught this law.

Laying bare the matter, the principle is this, that if the parties love one another, "God hath joined them together," it being a secondary consideration whether they ever saw a clergyman or justice of the peace in their lives. Under no circumstances is there adultery. But if they do not love one another even if they be millionaires or princes it is nothing but adultery, no matter if all the priests and preachers and justices in the world pronounced scholastic mummery over the union. No civic or ecclesiastical ceremony can sanctify a loveless marriage, nor can any decree of social ostracism or bull of excommunication or legal punishment dishonor the union of "Two souls with but a single thought,

Two hearts that beat as one."

"All thoughts—all passions—all delights
Whatever stirs this mortal frame
All are but ministers of Love,
And feed his sacred flame."

NUMBER TWENTY.

The Savior.

A few simple words about Jesus. In dealing with spirits it is necessary that one hold to the highest ideal of character possible in order to attract those who are modeling their own character after such an ideal. If the character of Jesus as portrayed in the Bible is the noblest concept, then nothing can recompense one for renouncing that ideal. For thousands of years the Jews looked for this deliverer, but when he came they did not recognize in the lowly Nazarene a personality that would from dire humiliation rise to become the most potent in tradition, history or fiction. To-day the churches think that his "second coming" is at hand. Will they make the old mistake, and fail to recognize him if he does come? Will his character differ from the concept they hold, and will he act as before in a way that shocks conventional Pharisaism?

Spiritualists generally depend for "salvation" on a divine principle that makes lovable in a degree every character, rather than on a personality. The noblest by his example only lifts one up where he can behold the principle and embrace it. Even in the words of Jesus regarding himself we find such an idea springing up e. g., "I am the light which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Again, "they shall say Lo! here is Christ or Lo! there, believe it not for as the light cometh out of the East and shineth unto the West, so also shall the coming be."

We may recognize in the general illumination of religious thought under "reason's ray" this coming, as the advent of Modern Spiritualism fulfills in the general diffusion of gifts that prophecy: "I will pour out of my spirit upon all flesh. Your young men shall see visions and your old men dream dreams," etc. We might also say that they who "rise to meet him in the clouds of heaven" are those humble ones who rise beyond the clouds that accompany dawning clairvoyance.

If the person Jesus does return, and certain conditions may naturally attract him and render it possible, I would look for his coming first as the "control" or "guide" of some lowly medium, and I would expect his character while alike to that of the scriptural Jesus in gentleness, tenderness, magnetic strength, etc., to vary in detail or expression, and I would not look for the print of the nails in his hands. There must be a surer sign of his identity than that. If we have passed the danger point and never again will religion degenerate into idolatry, bigotry, superstition, cruelty, then I would expect instead of a "man of sorrows" to behold a glad, cheerful, jovial character.

To repeat what I have said before, the ideal man is one both strong and gentle; one in whose magnetic quality the lion and the lamb lie down together. Even in the brute world the battle of the ages has been between the fierce and gentle, between the lion and the lamb, and in the end the lamb is victorious. Much more shall "the follower of the lamb" in the human family triumph; and to-day only in a less degree than formerly the opposition to a beneficent Spiritualism is rooted in the fierceness of mind we exhibit. We must cultivate the qualities of which the lamb is a fitting symbol—gentleness, meekness, etc.

In view of what is comprehensively grouped as "prenatal influences" and the effect of suggestion and mental atmosphere on the unborn babe, it is not strange at all that Jesus should manifest a superior character. The mother's mind concentrated on the idea that her child was a "son of Highest," the family and the whole nation supporting her in that continual suggestion. That he should excel was only the natural result of such conditions. The only unusual effect being in the gentleness of that character, when we might expect another warlike hero if there were not unseen influences tempering the savagery of these expectations. And the way for any mother to bless her child is by a mild persistence in cherishing the idea of nobility and purity in that child. We are all children of the Highest. "Have we not all one father?" Did not Jesus teach us to say "Our Father?" J. T. MACDONALD.

SPIRIT MESSAGES

As they Came from Mrs. Kates, at Des Moines, Iowa.

Mrs. Kates took the platform, says the Leader, and for twenty minutes was occupied in delivering messages from the depths of the spirit world. Mrs. Kates first insisted on the tent being closed and on certain disturbing influences in the shape of small boys prowling around on the outside of the sanctum being suppressed. She was considerably perturbed because of the threatened storm, but on being assured the omens were favorable that it would not rain, she proceeded. Mrs. Kates is a large, handsome woman, quite in contrast to the fragile being one is accustomed to think of as being chosen by the spirits as the means of communication with this vale of tears. She promptly suppressed Mr. Kates when he ventured to suggest something about the arrangement of the tent, said she knew her business, and re-assured the timid and fearful-looking by telling them they need not be afraid of ghosts and that she never saw one that would injure anybody. "I tell you, it's your own selves that you need to be afraid of," declared Mrs. Kates, with emphasis.

Mrs. Kates was first visited by Maggie and John Mitchell. She described them and said their names drifted out to a man sitting in the center of the crowd, who owned up he was acquainted with John Mitchell.

"I want to describe to you the influence of a spirit," said Mrs. Kates, gazing far off into space. "He was a young man, with handsome blue eyes. I feel as if he had passed out after a short illness. This name seems to leave me and to go down to the man sitting over there with the red pin in his tie. You, sir, did you ever know anyone of that kind?"

"No," answered the objective point of Mrs. Kates' vision, the individual who sensed the possession of the red tie-pin.

"He gives the name of Otto Schimm. That is a queer name. But he says he knew you, that you were employed in the same place he was. I think he must have had pneumonia or something of that sort. He seems to put his hand to my throat. I feel as if I should die with the pain," declared Mrs. Kates, waxing as pallid as the blushing cherry or the glowing rose. "He's of a chunkier build than you are, and, begging your pardon, not quite as irritable. And right here I want to say a word about you. You're the kind of a man that, if angry, just spits it right out. You're a man that hates a lie, now, aren't you?"

The man with the angry-looking tie-pin acknowledged he had a horror of deception.

Mrs. Kates then discussed Mr. Schimm some more and informed the man of the red tie-pin that it would probably be two days before he realized who had been manifesting himself, but there was no doubt he would then recall who it was.

Then Mrs. Kates heard the voice of a departed being, giving her name as Nellie, aged 19, having wonderfully soft brown hair and eyes of darkest blue, who had gone after a short illness, probably of typhoid. Others who manifested themselves were Mary and Samuel and Harry, and grandma, and Uncle John and Joey. Then Betsy, from across the water, was heard from, and her foreign headdress was minutely described.

"A spirit comes to me now—I see it distinctly. I want to go to the center of the room and describe him. I see the forehead. It is very handsome. The eyes are clear and the strongest I have ever looked at. I see him come to you. I want to go to you and touch your hand. Some say you are a genius. You're just as full of freaks as a young kid. I want to ask you something. Did you ever live on a farm when you were a boy? And do you remember the old spotty oxen and how you used to ride one of them to water?"

Here the weatherbeaten individual, who looked as if he had passed many a year in communion with the cornplow and had an intimate acquaintance with oats and hay and cattle and hogs, blushingly withdrew his imprisoned hand and confessed it was all true.

After this Mrs. Kates delivered message after message. "I'm attracted to this person here," she said, as she described a spirit hunting for an early brother, and as she drew near a large, red-faced man over on the right. "Let me touch your forehead. Here, don't draw back and look scared. I won't hurt you."

One message was from an elderly lady, who let the medium know just where the green pasteboard box was that contained a nightcap she left behind when she departed. In the course of delivering a message from "Sarah" to a woman in the audience, Mrs. Kates reminded her listener that it was along in 1896 that her spiritual nature began to develop. The woman said she didn't know. "Well, then, I'll be a little more explicit, though I don't like to do it," said Mrs. Kates. "There was a man in it, of course. It was along in October, 1896. Now, do you understand? Get out that old package of letters, for goodness sake, and burn it, for they're no more good than the man was."

One of the last visitations to the medium was from a fine-looking old gentleman, who used to have a cane and who left it in the hands of a friend. A man in the audience spoke up and admitted he had the cane.

THE ARISEN MOTHER.

Dedicated to Mrs. S. W. Moffatt, mother of Mrs. J. R. Francis.

How we miss our blessed mothers
When apart from them a spell
Weak are words within the language
To express; they cannot tell,
For no other like a mother
Can that loneliness dispel.

Sweet and gentle, kind and loving,
Bearing ever some one's cross,
When they lose her, oh, how dreadful
To her children is her loss,
For no other but a mother
Knows the pure gold from the dross.

Little mother, blessed mother,
Now upon the other shore,
Earth has lost thee, but thy sweetness
Will be valued evermore.
For no other as a mother
Has life's sacredness in store.

Farewell, mother, peaceful slumber
And sweet rest be unto thee;
Let thy spirit now in freedom
From all earthly troubles be,
For no other as a mother
Merits sweet eternity.

A SPIRITUAL POSTOFFICE

Account of a Seance with the Bangs Sisters.

I am desirous of giving your readers the details of a slate-writing seance that I recently had with the Bangs Sisters, and in doing so I wish to say that the extreme precautions taken to bar out any possibility of mortal imposition, or the manipulation of the slates by the mediums was not due to any skepticism on my part. I have no doubt of the integrity of the agents through whom these manifestations are produced. My purpose was to throw round the occasion every safeguard in order to procure absolutely impregnable evidence of spirit power that would stand the assaults of suspicion or the sneers of carping distrust. I give the facts absolutely as they transpired. I do not assume to explain them, but I cannot account for them on any other basis than that of intelligent action of decarnated mortals anxious to show that they yet live and love.

As a preliminary I procured a pair of large double slates from a stock on sale at a stationer's in this place. Cleaning these thoroughly, I placed between them two large letter sheets once folded. On one side of these sheets I addressed questions to several of my deceased friends and relatives. On the other side the sheet was left blank. The two sides of the slates were left clean and blank. I then sealed the slates together face to face with best joiner's glue, placing them under pressure to dry. After they had dried they were tested by witnesses who found that they could not wrench them apart by any ordinary means. Thus conditioned they were sealed together air tight. Then to remove them from any personal influence of my own—any subconscious, Hudsonian, introverted second-soul hypnotism, I locked them up securely and laid them away for a month. I then wrote to the Bangs sisters, making an appointment for a certain day. In doing this I neither divulged my locality nor my name, simply saying that I would identify myself when I came as "Double X."

When I called on them in Chicago I found I had placed myself in rather an equivocal position. They were suspicious of me and suggested that I probably had some sinister purpose in view, and as they did not know me and I had no references or recommendation. At this I interrupted, saying I carried my recommendation in my face and that my designs were wholly honest, as could be discovered by an inspection of their spirit friends. Finally, one of them agreed to sit for me. I do not know which one for I never saw them before and did not learn their names apart. She inquired my name, to which I replied that it was of no consequence and I had a purpose to keep it concealed. We sat at a small table, I on one side holding my hands over my slates which were covered by a heavy piece of tapestry to exclude the light. She sat on the other side of the table about a foot away but not with her hands upon it. We were all the time engaged in some general conversation and let matters take their course. She had a small tablet and pencil in her hands and after a few minutes she held up the tablet and asked, "Do you know that name?" What was my surprise to see that she had written my own name, and correctly spelled, although she had never under any circumstances heard my name.

As the seance proceeded she successively wrote out the names of every spirit addressed in the slates, except one; and this by giving their full names and in every instance correctly spelling them. Some of these were complex, being composed of three full names, as Emma Beardsley Martindale, Mary Crane White, Parmelia Farr Blanchard. Just note these and see the infinite chances of making a mistake in some of them. When nearly through the seance she remarked without writing, "I see you have addressed a question to Prof. David Swing?" "Yes," I said, "his name is on the slate." In no case did I make comment on the names or give leaders that would serve to frame an answer for the person addressed in the slate. I was determined they should be required to reveal themselves. It may be well to say that my visit occurred during that momentous domestic event known as spring housecleaning, which somewhat interfered with business; but when the seance was three-fourths over the second sister was induced to come and add her force to the work. In an hour the spirits indicated that they were through with the slates. These were not opened until I returned home when in the presence of witnesses and after ten minutes hard work they were cut apart without breaking. From the time they were sealed up until then they were not open within one hundred miles of the mediums, nor was it a physical possibility to reach or see inside of them.

The first question on the paper before mentioned was: "To any well-disposed spirit, Greeting.—If you wish to take advantage of this opportunity to write something important, or that will corroborate spirit communion with mortals, you are welcome, and I shall be interested to receive your contribution. Sincerely, C. H. Murray."

When the slates were cut apart it was found that all the surface was fully occupied in a response to the above as follows:

"Dear One of Earth:—We are all here to greet you to-day, a concourse of loving spirit friends, and as we draw near you in spirit so closely, it would certainly seem that you would sense our presence and love. How glorious it is to learn that death does not end all; that we are not separated for all time through the change, but instead realize a new and higher birth; an intensity of being through which we are able to penetrate the future and realize life in its highest sense. The spirit world is not so far apart from earth; in reality but a thin vail is between us. Gradually this is being removed, and in time you shall be able to converse freely with your loved ones on the higher side of life. We need not say to you that we are a frequent visitor in your home. We all feel you know this, and that we are silently giving you our best guidance and love always; for we feel and know you appreciate this fully. Do all you can to enlighten the mind and though you may not now see the fruits of your labor, the seed will be sown and the harvest will be given in the golden summer time of the hereafter.

"Your many loved ones All."

This communication was written in seven different colors, viz., red, green, blue, purple, pink, orange, yellow. Sometimes the color would be continuous for two lines, and sometimes change in the middle of a line. Although a piece of slate pencil was put in between the slates and also a new copper cent, the substance of these had not been utilized in producing the writing, the spirits preferring to make their own colors and supply their own material.

In addition to this the two blank pages of the letter sheet in the slates were written over full in ink. One of these was in response to the following:

"Rev. David Swing—Dear Prof.:—What are your present views of the destiny of the soul? Your former student, C. H. Murray."

(Reply.)

"My Friend and Student:—I am certainly most happy to greet you here to-day, and in reply to your earnest inquiry, would say: We were taught in years gone by when pressed a question too closely that there was a mystery in Godliness that no human mind should strive to fathom; so our eyes were blinded and reason set at naught—but the great laws of progress and evolution have carried us onward and upward until we feel more fully the divine worth within us and the close correspondence of our own soul to the great oversoul which no man can comprehend or understand. That little things confound the mighty, as this demonstration to-day points with its testimony, the everlasting progress of the soul. Yours for all truth and progress, "David Swing."

The other blank sheet in the slates was written in reply to this:

"Mr. John W. Erwin—Dear Sir:—I always greatly esteemed you and your family. As a matter of satisfaction, will you kindly give me the name of your oldest daughter—the last of your own family to follow you into the spirit world? From your old friend, "C. H. Murray."

(Reply.)

"My Dear Old Friend:—I am glad to greet you here to-day and add my testimony to continued life and the possibility of our return in communication with each loved one and friends. My oldest daughter Mary—last to follow me into spirit life is with me, and with my many other loved ones joins in love and best wishes to you. My friend, I am still interested in civil engineering, but in a much higher order than when of earth. Yours as of old, "John W. Erwin."

Mr. Erwin was a civil engineer of great ability. Please note now that there was nothing asked about engineering. His reply about his daughter is correct in detail and name. I add that in this case from my personal knowledge the handwriting is his own and the signature the fac simile of his signature on earth. The handwriting of his and Prof. Swing's is notably masculine, but each specific in character.

After these were written, one of the mediums said: "They have no more room but they wish to write some more." So two leaves were torn from a blank tablet and these were folded and sealed up in a new envelope that I held under my hand until the spirits indicated that they were done. As I had no motive in keeping these sealed the envelope was opened and found to contain three communications in reply to other addresses in the slates. These also are significant. One was;

"Emma Beardsley Martindale—Dear Relative:—I always greatly esteemed your and your family. As a matter of satisfaction, I should like to have something from you that would identify you and show that you yet remember me. You are not forgotten by "C. H. Murray."

(Reply.)

"Dear Cousin:—Greetings to you to-day that you may know I recognize your thoughts of me. I bring with me many loved ones, all of whom are glad to have you know that we still live and have found a world of youth, prosperity and happiness. From your cousin, "Emma Beardsley Martindale."

I would have preferred this to have been more specific as to identification. But it may be noted that in my address there is nothing to indicate the degree of relationship, but she at once addresses me as cousin, which is the correct relationship. The handwriting is very feminine and characteristic.

The next letter is in reply to this:

"Lida Potter Kirke:—Can you identify yourself to me in some assured manner? You should be generous enough to do so; you know how you used to trouble me? You have not forgotten C. H. Murray."

(Reply.)

"My Dear Old Sweetheart:—Yes, I troubled you with my love while of earth. I must still trouble you with my best thoughts, now that I am in spirit life. I am glad to greet you here, always glad to come to you in ever so slight a manner. How glad we should be that these privileges are given us; for so many friends of earth remain in darkness and doubt while their supposed dead hover about them anxiously waiting opportunity to give them the truth. I shall visit you again and often, my friend, and will insist upon repeating the often-told old story of love. Yours entirely and always, "Lida Potter Kirke."

There is a touch of nature in the above that my gray hairs are not ashamed of, and that fully justifies me in giving it to the public with the assurance that it is as much fun as otherwise.

The last letter has the sadness of tragedy in it.

"In evidence of my presence to-day I refer to the last sad scene of this life when I was so cruelly torn from my husband's life while on our wedding trip. Fate sometimes seems cruel indeed, but when you understand life as we do, we know that all things are well and wise. Your friend and well wisher, "Mrs. P. E. Blanchard."

This was a very beautiful lady that married a business man of Chicago. They went East on their wedding tour, were caught in a railway collision and she died in a few hours. Her husband was uninjured. She was a woman of culture and had the consolation of Spiritualism.

Mr. Editor, these letters spread over a wide field and furnish much serious thought for the sober-minded. They transcend all the cheap theology of creed-makers, widen the horizon of thought, endow nature with a fresher beneficence, and charm the soul with a melody that flows into it from the depths of the infinite.

DR. PHELON'S LETTER.

Brief Notes on Various Matters of Interest.

Nothing so exhibits the returning of the wheel of Time upon itself as the perusal of the day's record of events, in a Sunday newspaper. Forty to fifty pages of a conglomeration of letter press and illustration is a task for the most omnivorous reader, and yet many of our citizens essay the task of beginning at the headlines of the title-page and skipping nothing, make a finish at the last line of the last page. I have often wondered at the peculiar, drawn looks of the faces of some of our worthiest citizens when on the cars, going to business, Monday mornings. But the herculean effort to master the many items of the Sunday paper would account for it.

It is true that the color and execution of the illustrations may have a bearing on the beauty of the unborn generation. But present use is the motto of the moving forces now upon the stage of action; undoubtedly the inevitable will seize us, whether we are willing or unwilling. Really the people of to-day care little for the unfolding buds and blossoms. We are too busy with the deadly struggle of trying to "keep up with the procession," ourselves, to give any helping thought to coming generations, and the, to us, uncertain happenings.

Samuel Gompers, the man at the entering edge of the wedge of the Amalgamated Labor Unionism of the country, is in the city, with a few able assistants. California has always turned a willing ear, to the wooing of the bronze-visaged, muscle-hardened labor of the state. Here, in her chief city, a member of a labor union and a champion of Labor's interests, sits in the chair of the chief magistrate. There is no possible chance for Governor Gage's re-election. A popular man, or one backed by the affiliated interests of any class, may win the gubernatorial chair. Now is the time when productive activity in this direction may begin. Is that what Samuel Gompers, president of the Federated Labor of the United States, is here for? Of course, he doesn't tell. Why should he? He has shown his ability hitherto. It is not at all likely he has lost it. Events move rapidly, faster in some places than in others. We shall not be obliged to wait long to find out.

Side by side with the Sunday papers on my table, lie the works of Paracelsus, complete in two volumes, handsomely bound in maroon cloth, with untrimmed edges, gilt back and top. There are 800 quarto pages in the two, from the press of James Elliott & Co., of London, Eng. The translation is by Waite. As the best thought of one of the most popular of the Ancient Hermetists, these works are highly valued by the Hermetic Brotherhood. It may seem curious how expensive occult works of this nature happen to be in a public library. Our buying committees, as a rule, have no particular leaning toward occultism, or Spiritualism, and still less if there be an alchemical trend in the writer; but a little ticket pasted on the inside of the cover, explains; it reads:

San Francisco
Free Public Library.
Gift of William Emmette Coleman.
Date April, 1902.

It is conceded by those who know, that Mr. Coleman has the finest private library on this coast, containing many rare and valuable books of ancient and modern times.

The suggestions of occultism and its affiliated lines of thought, recall to us the growth of our perceptions and consciousness of this subject, that is as high as the highest, and as deep as the lowest. As veil after veil drops from before us, continuing to question, do we not come to the point that the Supreme Essence is simply Force. Force is everywhere, so God is declared to be. Force constitutes our lives in activity. When force ceases, we are dead.

It is an often reiterated remark by those who concern themselves with the substance and conditions of the Unseen, that there is but one animating force. We can use it for the advantage or disadvantage of others as we will. That is to say, it makes no difference whether a Mental Healer starts the vibrations necessary for the restoration of health and strength in a body by the use of words of prayer or cursing. If this be true, we simply deal with the impelling force, and not the sense or meaning of the words per se. It is like the wonderful materializing of the Indian fakirs, of which the camera shows no trace.

The annual convention of the State Spiritualist Association is set for Sept. 5, 6 and 7. It is hoped that potency, harmony and earnestness will preside over all their deliberations.

Dr. Frances C. Treadwell has entered into the rest of the Summerland. She was nearly fourscore years of age. She has been for many years a successful dentist in San Francisco. She was an earnest and outspoken Spiritualist. In her daily life, she was constantly in the consciousness of the ministrations of her friends, who had preceded her through the golden gate ever swinging inward, but never outward. She was cremated.

Dr. W. M. Forster, one of our prominent physicians, who barely escaped death from being run over by a railroad train a year ago, has so far recovered, that he has resumed practice, which will be joyful news to all his old patrons.

The Society of Progressive Spiritualists has adjourned for its usual summer vacation.

INFORMATION.

Many of our subscribers seem to be laboring under a mistake regarding our new premium book, the title of which is "RELIGION OF MAN AND ETHICS OF SCIENCE." This is the title of ONE book, not two, and costs but 25 cents when ordered with the paper for one year.

The Significance of Spiritualism.

It is not well or wise to take a narrow view of the import and significance of Spiritualism. To narrow it down in our mental definition to a mere phenomenal spiritism, embodied and expressed in raps, writings, and other physical manifestations, is to denude it of its highest and most vital signification. For while these phenomena are of grand importance in establishing the truth of spirit being and communication, and so are of inestimable value as a foundation knowledge, to confine Spiritualism to phenomenal manifestations is to circumscribe and belittle its range and grandeur, and minimize its usefulness as a factor in man's spiritual progression.

Not as a soulless science, nor yet as a mere hazy idealism, does Spiritualism stand in its relations to man.

It differs from theology, for theology utterly lacks induction, being built upon theories and dogmatic assumptions, not on the substantial basis of facts. As a result, religion derived from theology is the embodiment of superstition. Deductive reasoning is the only method allowable in the system of theology.

Science is based upon facts—and the genuine spirit of science spurns no facts, at the beck of prejudice religious or other.

Spiritualism presents facts, which genuine science cannot ignore, though "scientific prejudice" may ignore or deny them.

Spiritualism presents facts admitting demonstration and classification, it presents facts which are matters of observation and knowledge, and hence a basis for inductive as well as deductive reasoning. Hence, unlike theology, it furnishes to science the grounds and possibilities of philosophical analysis, and exhibits the elements of principle and law.

Much has been said and written about religion, pro and con. We may say, it is a perception of the universal truth, beauty and goodness, with our relationship thereto, and the resultant ethical obligations.

Spiritualism, then, comprehends not only spiritual phenomena, but, in its ultimate expression, it is a comprehensive, universal system, covering science, religion and whatever pertains to the highest growth of the human being, for time and the eternal now.

Considered wholly in its relationships and bearings upon mortal life in its social, mental, moral, economic conditions, when properly understood, Spiritualism is laden with weighty significance, as concerns the welfare of humanity here and now, as doing away with false and unjust conditions, conditions that are inharmonious and anti-ethical.

This, on its purely human side, is rich with significance that appeals to the highest sentiments of right and truth and justice.

But all this is supplemented and reinforced with the spiritual significance of Spiritualism, as bearing upon man's spiritual nature; an influence, an effluence, inspiring high and pure ideals and aspirations, ever uplifting and ever progressive.

Such are some faint glimpses of the significance of Spiritualism.

An Object Lesson

An instructive object lesson is presented just now, wherein Catholics turn protestants, to the extent that, in convention assembled they give voice to a vigorous protest against the teaching of Protestantism in the Philippine schools, which, they charge, is being done by American teachers sent there.

The charge is authoritatively denied, however. But it is well that these zealous Romanists put themselves on record, for the spectacle is instructive, at least.

It is a question, however, though scarcely debatable, whether these very zealous and jealous Romanists would ever protest against Romanism being taught in the schools. It is a common thing, in fact it is the rule in Catholic countries, for Romanism to be taught in the schools—such schools as there are—and that, too, by priestly instructors, and by others under their guidance and authoritative sway.

And was ever a Romanist known to protest against such a course? The very question is absurd in face of the facts.

But it demonstrates the insincerity of this Romish protest in the case of the Philippine schools, if the matter is viewed in its relation to human equality of rights according to the American view. The Romish view is entirely a different affair—which is that all rights belong to the Catholic church, and none else has a right to protest.

In the Romish view, it is all right when the Protestant ox is gored, but all wrong when the Romish ox is the one to suffer.

IS MEDIUMSHIP DEMORALIZING? MODEL HIGH RESOLVES.

Much has been said and written of the low order of spirits that accompany phenomenal mediums; and it is often affirmed with much assurance and emphasis, that mediums of that class are of inferior mold, with sensual tendencies, and intellectual weakness. It is held by many that all physical mediumship is demoralizing in its tendencies and influence, destructive to health, and dangerous to virtue; and that both spirits and mediums gravitate to vice and debauchery. That there are many representative cases that justify these conclusions may be admitted without discussion. But is it the rule, representing a law in nature and spirit?

Can it be that a fact so tremendous in its significance as the scientific demonstration of the continuity of life, or immortality, is essentially bad and dangerous to the human agents, indispensable to the solution of this age long problem? I think not.

Ignorance is always dangerous to the best interests of society and the world; and low moral conditions are indigenous to undeveloped human nature. No great question is ever settled without a struggle with the environments of ignorance. No revelation was ever made to this world, that did not carry with it much error, confusion and misunderstanding, and wherever human nature is concerned the dark side is always represented.

No human being is without his (or her) quota of concealed tendencies, and germs of vice, folly and falsehood. These manifest variously, and often conflictingly, according to environment, and the stimuli that appeal to the impulses, passions, and germinal desires derived from antecedents and circumstances. Mediumship intensifies these appeals. It evokes the hidden tendencies and warms to active life the deep reserves of the soul; and their primitive expression is liable to be chaotic and crude; and to manifest much that the ignorant world interprets as wickedness, sin, depravity. All of this has been enacted and re-enacted in the evolution of the spiritual nature of man, countless millions of times—without ever a hint of a spiritual medium in the groaning centuries that wrestled with destiny and toiled toward a higher expression.

Every religious movement has been associated with mediumship, and has evolved its quota of vice, folly and crime; but these were as inevitable as earthquakes, volcanoes, floods and cyclones in the growing life of the earth.

But spiritual mediumship of the 19th and 20th centuries has introduced a new era. It has defied all the old concepts of the two-world relations and introduced a system of experimentation, scientific study of nature, and a general philosophy of life, universal, and spiritual that has never before been represented by any cult, or system of religion in the history of nations. They have all had fragmentary hints, and some far-reaching ideals and spiritual illustrations; but Modern Spiritualism is not only a fact, or a combination of facts, but it is an inductive science, which is all-inclusive. It has undertaken the solution of all spiritual, moral and natural problems, by means of an extended area of facts which include the physical and the spiritual world in conjoint relations, and an ever widening field of suppliers by means of mediumship, and intelligent testimony, supported by experience, and subject to practically limitless illustrations, confirmations, and variations by which to establish every conclusion, and settle every doubtful theory of human life and destiny.

We can well afford to work and wait, and to treat all mediums with just and generous consideration, and aid them in all ways open to us in using and improving their most valuable gifts. If they are weak, we may help them to be strong. If in the strange complexity of influences which their sensitive susceptibility brings into their lives, they are bewildered and betrayed, we may seek for the cause—or causes—and help them to self-possession while walking on dangerous ground. But there are many excellent mediums, whose lives are as pure and truthful as the best of those who criticise them.

Because some disappoint us, and lapse into evil ways, or deceptive work in the seance-room, is no reason for assuming that phenomenal mediumship is essentially low and demoralizing.

Some Christian ministers are low and vicious.

Some honored and trusted college professors have committed murder.

Senators of the United States have been drunken debauchees, and even one honored with the highest gift in the power of the people to confer, has been known to be frequently helplessly drunk.

In illustration of the sentiments and loyalty of a true spiritual medium, and the high qualities of her spiritual guides, I hereby present a copy of the High Resolves which, dictated by the spirit, is used as the opening and directing suggestion in all her seances, and all her developing circles. It is the substitute for a song, or prayer, used by Augusta Ferris, of Grand Rapids, Mich., and fitly closes and supports the foregoing estimate of mediums and mediumship. By frequent repetition these loyal resolutions become a part of the mental habitudes thus imposed.

HIGH RESOLVES.

"I will speak the truth and lead a life of truthfulness.

"I will not be a tattler of what I may hear derogatory to others, lest it be falsehood, and do them an injury.

"I will not assume to be what I am not.

"I will not lay claims to spiritual gifts which I do not possess, and if gifted by the spirit, I will not assume for the spirit that which I do for myself, for this is a lie and a cheat.

"I will strive to be pure in body and mind.

"I will strive to keep myself unspotted before the world, knowing that my spirit friends behold my very acts and thoughts.

"I will not use profane or improper language.

"I will avoid licentiousness which seeks to creep into houses and destroys the peace and happiness of our homes, the purity of our souls.

"I will keep my body as well as my spirit clean and endeavor to be pure in all things."

Who can repeat these resolutions without being impressed with their significance and strengthened in moral integrity? But it does not follow that all who repeat them are rendered proof against evil temptations. They are not a guaranty that the medium herself is always equal to the fulfillment of these promises; but the mere conception of them, indicates a moral status that is rich in promise, and I think Mrs. Ferris' seances usually impress her patrons with the sincerity expressed in these noble resolves. They might be repeated with profit by all phenomenal mediums.

LYMAN C. HOWE.

Religion of Science.

Herbert Spencer [says the Chicago Inter Ocean] philosopher and sage, gave a book to the world a few months ago, with the message that it was his last. Now comes Sir Henry Thompson, surgeon, scientist, literateur, and painter, with a farewell message. Like Spencer, he is nearing the end.

For nearly forty years Sir Henry Thompson has been among the most distinguished of surgeons. Astronomy has been his idol. However, he has written two novels and many books and papers on surgical and medical subjects. He also has ben a frequent exhibitor at the Academy and the Salon.

Now, in his eighty-second year, he declares the result of twenty years' search for a spiritual foothold—his "attempt to seek, by careful induction from available data, some certain assurance respecting the influence which the 'Infinite and Eternal Energy from which all things proceed' has exercised on man throughout his long career on earth."

This search has not led Sir Henry Thompson to the god of any of the revealed religions. He thinks the terms God, Jehovah, Theos, Jove, etc., should not be used in scientific writing, for the reason that they have become so "completely identified by long association of ideas with schemes of theological doctrine based on the alleged existence or personal appearance on earth of the beings thus named."

From the progress of man and the known universe, he has tried to find some hint of the tendency, disposition, and purpose of the Eternal Energy which lies behind phenomena. "One method alone," he says, "can throw light on the subject, viz., a studious observation of the facts of nature and of the inferences which may be legitimately drawn from them."

He devotes the first half of his book to a rapid survey of the assumed development of man from the anthropoid ape. His inference from this survey of the long and difficult course which man has traversed through countless ages is that man has won every step solely by his own unaided efforts. He says that many may feel a sense of regret that, had it been possible, aid should not now and then have been proffered at certain turning points in man's history. Some have been unable to believe in the beneficent tendencies of The Unknown Source of all power because of this apparent neglect or indifference in regard to man's progress.

But it is next to certain, he argues, that had the human race received at any time a revelation—say, of the means of obtaining fire, or of the elements of agriculture, or of the complete relief from suffering which modern science has discovered—man would never have become the efficient creature he is. Man has passed through an educational course of the most perfect kind—self-taught, not "helped."

In this the aged scientist sees complete and decisive proof of the beneficent tendency exercised by the "Source of the Infinite and Eternal Energy."

The scientific man's religion, according to Sir Henry Thompson, is one in which a priestly hierarchy has no place. To him religion, in the phrase of Huxley, ought to mean "simply reverence and love for the ethical idea, and the desire to realize that ideal in life."

He does not desire to disturb the beliefs of those who derive comfort and strength for well-doing from the Christian faith, but he foresees a division of mankind into two classes—those who enjoy complete liberty of thought and action and practice the manly virtues which are associated therewith, and those who have renounced the exercise of reason and inquiry into matters religious, relying on the promise of ultimate admission to the Gate of St. Peter as the reward of this implicit obedience.

He himself was greatly depressed during the first part of his inquiry, but the conclusion of his work wrought a complete change. Thus he says: "And the result of my labor has at last brought me its own reward, by conferring emancipation from the fetters of all the creeds, and unshakable confidence in the Power, the Wisdom, and the Beneficences which pervade and rule the universe," in whatever light they may be considered. These thoughts are in harmony with the views expressed by many prominent Spiritualists. They have abandoned all creeds yet believe there is something—whether a he, she, it, force or principle—that controls the universe.

Wasting Time.

It may be that some of the great investigative minds have time to waste and money to throw to the sparrows, for it seems the very essence of nonsense to speculate upon the age of the world, the inhabitable or inhabited age of this planet. Opinions are now running all the way from 20,000,000 to 500,000,000 years.

We know it is inhabited and the soil is being tilled and the inhabitants are multiplying rapidly, and the greatest and most important problem to solve by these great minds who have money to burn, is the prosperity and advancement of this rapidly increasing population.

What does the honest, hard-working man with a family of six or eight, or a dozen children depending upon him for support from a salary of $2.00 a day, care how long the world has been inhabited, and what would it benefit him to know it.

There has come along with man's religious teachings, or rather his irreligious teachings, a kind of greed, or abnormal selfishness that has reached in some, downright madness and hoggishness, until nothing short of owning the earth will satisfy their insatiate greed, and now they are after its pedigree, its record, its age, the genealogy of its population, a business way of taking an inventory of the personal property thereon, "taking stock," is the term now used.

As is the delight of some people regarding their age, this old world has kept the matter a dead secret, and it is of no importance to man to know it. The important feature is to know how to utilize it to the advantage of all upon its motherly old bosom, and not to the enrichment of a few and the oppression of the many.

Miracles Not Strange.

No law of nature is violated in the performance of miracles, according to Professor W. Douglas Mackenzie of the Chicago Theological Seminary.

In a lecture on "Miracles" before students at the University of Chicago, Professor Mackenzie said:

"When a miracle is accomplished a force is exercised which makes it possible to overcome material forces which are working.

"For instance, when Christ walked on the sea he had the superhuman power of bringing a force into action which kept gravitation from acting. When men were raised from the dead all the forces of nature were working, but were overcome by this other force, which no human being has the power to exert."

If we take Webster as a guide to the definition of the word "Miracle," there are many miracles occurring at the present time. Webster's definition is, "A wonder, or wonderful thing. Specifically an event or effect contrary to the established constitution and course of things; or a deviation from the known laws of nature; a supernatural event."

When it comes to the supernatural events, science and Spiritualism have set the idea aside since Father Webster's time. Every event is natural now, whether understood or not by man.

Nothing is and nothing can be outside of Nature and her principles, her laws.

Wonderful things occur every day within the bounds of natural laws, things we cannot understand, things that are in "deviation of" any law known upon earth, and yet there is a cause behind, a natural law.

Many occurrences of yesterday called miracles are common property to-day. Science has torn down the framework of so many miracles in the last fifty years that not even a land-mark remains for miracle hunters to cling to for consolation.

The rainbow was a miracle, the flash of lightning, the comet, the moon's eclipse; turning water into wine, walking on water, raising the dead, curing the blind, the lame and the sick, etc., were miracles once, but all of them are understood now and are but events in nature.

Miracles began to disappear when men began to think independently, began to reason, investigate, analyze.

Ignorance fosters the miraculous and gives the supernatural explanations to all things not understood.

Wisdom changes the miracles into effects that have natural causes back of them, laughs at old superstitions as a jolly old professor would laugh at a good joke, and explains occurrences that are mystifying in a scientific way and leave all doors open.

The force by which a Jesus could resist the law of gravitation and walk on the water has been employed by mediums since, and is understood as "levitation."

In Spiritualism these forces are employed in moving material things about without human agencies or physical contact, and is called spirit levitation, or control of material things by spirit power.

Miracles are not strange, for there are no miracles in the supernatural sense. There are superhuman occurrences whenever there are occurrences outside the human power or force, but they are natural, not supernatural.

"The Brown Book" of Boston Pictures a Chicago Angel.

Fifteen years ago in Chicago, a young girl of wealth, leisure and social position found herself facing the question of what to do with her life. Travel, a gay existence in society, study with the best masters were alike open to her, but with all these desirable privileges she had been born with a great world-pity, and because of this, the manner of living of her kind failed to satisfy her. About this time the social settlement movement was started in America, and that girl, whose name is Jane Addams, consecrated her wealth, her ability, and her life to the project, and founded the famous Hull House of Chicago. In the poorest ward in that city Miss Addams went to live and made herself one with the people about her, believing that by example and daily contact she could uplift and bring to the dreary and isolated a fuller participation of the common heritage. For over twelve years she has lived at Hull House, and by reason of her ability and clear-sighted intelligence has made it one of the most important connections yet between the privileged and the unprivileged.

Miss Addams is in a position to speak authoritatively to the working classes, and of the working classes, because she belongs to those whose want of popularity she so clearly recognized. Therefore what she says in her latest book, 'Social Ethics," on domestic service is worthy of a serious consideration.

She sympathizes with the attitude taken by the working people on the question of personal service and says: "That, except from the savings bank standpoint, work in shop and factory is better paid than the work in the household. The opportunity for saying may be better for the employee in the household than of the factory, but her family saves more when she works in the factory and lives with them. The rent is no more when she is at home. The $2.50 a week she pays into the family fund more than covers the cost of her actual food, and at night she can often contribute toward the family labor by helping her mother wash and sew." Even for the younger factory girls and clerks, whose wages are less than those of domestic servants, there is always present the possibility that at some time their earnings may be much higher. "A girl finds it easier to be content with three dollars a week when she pays for board in a scale of wages rising toward ten dollars than to be content with four dollars a week and pay no board in a scale of wages rising toward six dollars, and the girl well knows that there are scores of forewomen at sixty dollars a month for one forty dollar cook or fifty dollar housekeeper."

From the well-meaning charity visitor who comes with the best desire in the world to help the poor people in their distress, Miss Addams has infinite trouble and complaint. She says that the visitor holds her poor family so hard to a standard of thrift that she really breaks down a rule of higher living that they formerly possessed; that saving which seems quite commendable in a comfortable part of the town appears almost wicked in a poorer quarter where the next-door neighbor needs food.

One of the neighbors of the Hull House is a tailor, who supports a wife, three children and his parents on eight dollars a week. He insists that it would be criminal not to expend every penny of this amount upon food and shelter, and he expects his children later to take care of him. In another family that Miss Addams has known for six years, the daughter, a girl of twenty-five, has received two cents a week out of her wages given to the support of the household.

A simple creed is that of Miss Jane Addams. She believes at the day of judgment the test will not be in questions regarding personal and family relations, but "Did ye visit the poor, the criminal, the sick, and did ye feed the hungry?"

Miss Addams illustrates the Spiritualistic idea inculcated in our philosophy, that each one should lend a helping hand to those less fortunate in life. She is a messenger of love and goodwill to the poorer classes.

Duality of Spiritualism.

It is not in any such sense as that of Hudson's much exploited "Working Hypothesis," of man's "dual mind," as set forth with great apparent show of inductive logic in his "Law of Psychic Phenomena," that we use the term Duality of Spiritualism. It is easy to demonstrate that that remarkable opponent of Spiritualism, which he attempts to demolish by means of his assumed hypothesis, is thoroughly at cross purposes with himself, self-contradictory and self-destructive, and his dual-mind is so constructed in his statements, that it resembles Lowell's "good-natured dance with the best of intentions," of whom Lowell wrote,

"One of his legs would just trip up the other."

But this is not our present object, nor the thought in our mind, to which we wish to direct our readers' attention, as worthy of some consideration, in fact, pleasurable consideration to Spiritualists.

The duality of Spiritualism, to which we refer, consists in the fact that it furnishes strong attraction to two widely diverse orders of mind. The strangeness and mystery pertaining to the phenomena appeals to the masses: and the exalted order of the truths it presents affords strong, pressing invitation to the most ardent research of the scientist and philosopher.

Thus two widely variant qualities that dominate the world of mind are met and gratified, each in its own field of thought, by the facts and the truths of Spiritualism.

Indeed it may be said with truth, that it is a cardinal excellency of Spiritualism, that, in one way or another, it furnishes strong attractions to all classes of minds, and more especially to those in earnest and honest search of truth.

But, as keeping to our text, the Duality of Spiritualism, it will be recognized by the thoughtfully observant, that there are two strongly marked tendencies or casts of mind in the world: the bias of the one is toward mysticism; it revels in the occult, the mysterious, the apparently supernatural, the uncanny, the marvelous in the line of spirit phenomena; the bent of the other class is philosophical, toward careful analysis and scientific research, and the application of facts as related to ethics, and the consideration of truth in its philosophical aspects.

It is matter for gratulation that Spiritualism furnishes richly abundant material to supply the demands of both classes. It furnishes that which appeals to the highest in man's aspirational nature, as well as that which satisfies the cast of mind that delights in the weird and sensational.

At Set of Sun.

If we sit down at set of sun
And count the things that we have done
And counting find
One self-denying act, one word
That eased the heart of him who heard,
One glance most kind
That fell like sunshine where it went,
Then we may count the day well spent.

But if through all the livelong day
We've eased no heart by yea or nay;
If through it all
We've done no thing that we can trace
That brought the sunshine to a face;
No act, most small,
That helped a soul and nothing cost,
Then count that day as worse than lost.

"Unconscious Memory."

The Christian Herald, of New York, sets forth that "a leading medical journal reports a singular instance of a revival of childhood memories. A lady, seventy years of age, was under treatment for broncho-pneumonia. It was a critical case, owing to the advanced age of the patient, and it became almost desperate when delirium set in and continued for three days. The patient eventually recovered, but the feature of her illness, which is of interest to medical science, was the peculiarity of her talk during her delirium. It was in a foreign language, that neither the doctors nor the nurse could understand. A lady who came to inquire after her, however, recognized it immediately as Hindustani. She was quite as much puzzled as the doctors at hearing her friend speaking so volubly, for she was aware that before her illness she could not speak the language. She knew about a dozen Hindustani words, but could not frame them into a sentence; yet in her illness she recited long poems in Hindustani, and put questions and apparently answered imaginary questions in that language. When the patient recovered she was as incapable as before her illness of speaking the language. It appears that she was born in India, and until she was five years old was in charge of a nurse who could not speak English. She was sent at the age of five to England to be educated, and she married there and did not return to India. She completely forgot the language of her childhood, and had casually mentioned that she had done so to the lady who called upon her during her illness. The incident strikingly confirms the theory recently propounded by psychologists, that there is a subconscious mind which retains all impressions, and reproduces them when the active mind loses control. What an ominous fact this is for those who do not seek the cleansing which comes through Christ. They may find forgotten sins eventually coming to mind to condemn them in the judgment.

The correspondent who sends the above to this office, asks: "Does not this explain away Spiritualism?" No! It simply demonstrates a fact in the phenomena of Spiritualism. The old woman was controlled by a spirit, who recited long poems in Hindustani, etc.

The Various Spiritualist Camps.

They are all doing an excellent work; they are all modeled after one plan, and the teachings given are along practically the same lines. When you have visited one camp, you have a practical knowledge of all the rest, and this is fortunate, from the simple fact there are about fifty in different parts of the country. The camp is simply an enlarged Spiritualistic meeting in localities where nature lends her charms to add to the interest of the occasion. We are glad to receive brief items from the camps, but cannot undertake to publish the full programme of each one. Those interested can send to the various secretaries for them. We have always taken special pains to publish early in the season a list of the leading camps, with their secretaries, so that all who are interested can write for the particular information they desire.

OUR PREMIUM BOOK

Religion of Man and Ethics of Science.

In common with many other Spiritualists I have ever appreciated the writings of Hudson Tuttle, and considered him one of the most level-headed of men; but his work, your latest Premium Book, surpasses anything yet produced in Spiritualistic literature in masterful grasp and the comprehension of problems of life; not a weak or commonplace paragraph or sentence in it. Metaphysicians may quibble over his views on "Fate," but scholars will praise its accuracy in general, and philosophers will read it with restful satisfaction. Now, friends, you who are clamoring for a new Bible, take "Religion of Man and Ethics of Science" as a foundation, and induce Mr. Tuttle to edit a Synoptic Topical Resume of the other Premium Books, and it will be a grander Bible, embodying more truth and common sense than all the sacred books ever promulgated by prophet, priest, magician or theologian. And you, Brother Francis, for placing these books within reach of all will not only receive the gratitude of progressive souls, but be accorded full recompense as certain as justice is an attribute of the finer central forces and intelligence.

Cultured Mediumship.

Mrs. Mary T. Longley Relates Her Mediumistic and Educational Experience.

To the Editor and Readers of The Progressive Thinker:

Dear Friends:—It is with pleasure and instruction that I have perused the able and well written article in the July 15th number of The Progressive Thinker from the pen of our good sister and co-worker, Mrs. Clara Watson, concerning the education of mediums, and as I find so much in the experience of the writer, similar to my own, the thought suggests itself that perhaps if some of the veteran mediums would give concise accounts of their early mediumship to the public, the workers of a later day might derive pleasure and help thereby. It is with this thought that I venture to write a little of my own experiences as one in our ranks, who has largely been educated by the spirit world helpers, who have ever brought instruction, aid and encouragement to the willing instruments who have desired to learn and grow, mentally and spiritually. Like our friend Mrs. Watson, I had but a very few years of common schooling, owing to weak eyes, for my mother feared blindness for me in the early years, from the effects of scarlet fever. I attended the common schools of the day, from the age of six years to that of twelve, and no longer. When fourteen, in 1868, I was for the first time entranced by a spirit intelligence, and from that period to the present, I have been a public and private instrument of the spirit world. For three years of my earliest mediumship, my mother held free circles for the public in our home, three evenings a week, as I was a test medium, who at that time was personally influenced by the spirit friends of those who came to learn of the other life.

Before I was first entranced, I had never sat for development, and we were all astonished when the manifestation of mediumship came to me, but afterwards, for a period of twelve years, we held our home circles, where the development into other phases of mental mediumship went on—I have never had physical mediumship of any kind—and where we learned many wise and good lessons from the invisible helpers who gave us of their aid and strength. Having so little schooling in my youth, and being the daughter of a poor invalid soldier, who had his ankle shattered in the battle of Gettysburg, my parents could give me no advantages of a further education, even after my eyes and sight had strengthened. My knowledge of classics and lore generally was sadly deficient, but I am glad to say that I had sufficient sense to wish to learn, and not to remain an ignoramus, and I was quick to accept and profit by any correction of speech, grammar or other blunder, that friends on either side of life were kind enough to favor me with. In the course of three or four years after my first entrancement, the "Guides"—and I love that word, Mr. Editor; for these blessed friends from beyond, from my reverend "Father" Pierpont, to my trusted Lotela, have proved the most loving, loyal, and helpful of guides and counselors to me—stimulated other powers of mediumship in my organism, such as writing mediumship, poetical inspiration, etc., and later on they brought me forth upon the platform as their mouthpiece; into the arena of authorship, in serial and book production; and have used me for years as a worker in various lines, the last four years as secretary of the N. S. A., in which latter capacity, it is not in the expression of any special mediumship, however, that my duty lays, but in the all-round exercise of business and mental qualities, that these same unseen friends have assisted me to unfold.

My spirit helpers, like those of Mrs. Watson, gradually taught me many things such as the student in school and college may learn, and much else that no academical course can impart. They encouraged me to read works of standard literature, also of science and philosophy; they never believed that a medium should not read or study, or inform himself on past and current events. They brought me friends in earth life, who were cultured and educated, and who also aided me in my selections of reading matter, so that I was blessed from both sides of life. A large part of my mediumship for many years was devoted to giving advice and prescriptions for the sick; for three years I practiced successfully without any personal knowledge of medicine, and with very little of anatomy. At that time I concluded to study along these lines, and I asked the opinion of my medical guide, old Dr. John Warren; instead of discouraging me, he said there was no objection, for he considered that no one could know too much of the body and its conditions; I therefore studied, and in the course of time, when old Massachusetts concluded it was necessary to register its physicians, the Medical Board of Registration classified me as an M. D. without qualification.

As one who served fourteen years in the Banner of Light Free Circle room as message medium, and years before then in like capacity for the Voice of Angels, also who did much editorial work for three prominent Spiritual papers, who has been writer, paper correspondent, lecturer, and worker in journalistic lines for years, it would seem that none could have needed a liberal and extended education of the schools more than myself, and yet this was denied to me, and but for the work of the angels with and for me, I might have passed my days in the narrow sphere of unenlightened and unrefined ignorance. No one knows better than myself my deficiencies and limitations, nor has anyone wished for a college education more, yet I have been enabled to do my work, and to feel assured that under proper conditions we can have teachers from above, that understand our needs better than the schools of earth may do. Of course, I have been specially favored, by having been conscious of the lectures, poems, articles for print, and other educational matter given through my mediumship, and by having a mind quick to learn, and a desire to profit by any needed correction in the line indicated. However, it does seem to me that any medium who really has the will and wish to grow intellectually and to improve in mental expression, will receive such aid from both sides of life as will enable him or her to advance well along these lines.

In my band of invisible workers I have had many helpers; I claim no high potentates as "guides," but those who have come to me are human, kindly, sympathetic and intelligent. Unlike Mrs. Watson, I have dear Indian helpers, although I was a trance medium for six years before I had even one visit from an Indian spirit, and during that time the spirits of white people who had incessantly used my powers had drafted me of vital strength till I became fair to be an invalid. The first Indian who came to me in our home circle—and I believe in and advocate the establishment of the home circle—was brought to me by Spirit Mrs. J. H. Conant, the former Banner of Light medium, whose place I was, later in years, destined to fill, though then I knew it not—who stated that I must have the Indian magnetism and elements, or I would soon become of but little use to the world as a medium. Since then I have had a whole group of Indians, some of them very cultured and refined, all of them intelligent and good students, quick to learn and to mentally unfold. I love the Indians, I have every reason to; my experience with them has been a good one. My Lotela was brought to me when she was a child of seven, fresh from Dakota, having been in spirit life but three months, bright, active, untamed, and unable to speak a word of our language; surely we knew not what to do with her, but others of the band told us to get books and teach her from our side, and they would train her on their side of life, and the work went on; Luther Colby, of the Banner of Light, taught her to write in our language, until Lotela, who has been known far and wide, in her writings and speech, cannot now be distinguished from some highly educated, gentle and refined maiden of the white race. Other messenger spirits who came as little children have grown almost under our very eyes, from the training they have received in the spirit "schools," the last of my band being Nannie, who came to me, brought by Lotela, six years ago, while I lived in California, a lisping tot of three years, not an Indian, who told us many wondrous things of spirit work and schools; she is now a little maid of nine years, no longer lisping and babyish in speech, but a child rapidly maturing, and a friend to all whom she meets.

But I must close, Mr. Editor, for this paper has exceeded its limits in your valuable Progressive Thinker, I fear; it seems to me to be almost too personal, but I assure its readers it is not written in the spirit of egotism, for I claim no credit for the work of the angels with my mediumship, other than that of trying to be a willing instrument; but it is written with the hope of encouraging some poor medium, who cannot have the advantage of a college education, to do the best he can, and to take heed of whatever chance of learning he may reach. I believe in schools, and I wish all colleges and schools and their teachers God-speed in all good works for humanity; but if we cannot have the benefit of their favors we may be able to press on without them.

With good will to all, cordially yours,

MARY T. LONGLEY.

Fear Only the Fear of Death.

Men should be afraid of the fear of death—not of death itself. If men follow this rule, there is no reason why they should not all become centenarians—so it is asserted in the Revue d'Economie by M. Jean Finot, says the Chicago Tribune.

This author begins an article on the limitations of life by mentioning some traditional long lives. Among these cases are those of a resident of Goa, who is said to have reached his 400th year in the enjoyment of all his intellectual faculties, a Scotchman who lived to be over 200 years old, and various monks of Mont Athos who have reached 150 years. He asserts that Servian statistics for 1897 show three persons between 135 and 140 years old, eighteen from 136 to 135, 123 from 115 to 125, and 200 from 105 to 115. In 1890 there were, he says, in the United States, 3,981 persons over 100 years old, and 21 in London. M. Finot cites a mathematical formula, which he credits to Dr. Richardson, by which anyone may get an idea of his probable length of life. It is only necessary to add the ages of one's father and mother to those of one's two grandfathers and two grandmothers, and the total divided by six indicates the exact number of years one should live.

M. Finot does not believe that the average length of life has been reduced. On the contrary, he believes that it is constantly increasing, owing to the progress of hygiene. Why do we grow old at all? The writer answers:

"For three reasons: Want of physical exercise in the open air; poisoning by microbes which the phagocytes have not succeeded in destroying; fear of death. It is hard to imagine the importance of this last element. If a man fears death, it will carry him away. And yet it is quite pleasant to die; no sensation could be compared to it."

To prove this assertion, M. Finot quotes Helm, who related the sensations he experienced while falling with his companions from the summit of one of the Alps to a death which he miraculously escaped:

"At first a sense of beatitude, then complete insensibility to touch and pain; finally an extreme rapidity of thought and of imagination which in a few seconds enabled him to recollect the events of his whole life. Therefore it is not death we should fear, but the fear it inspires in us. We are wrong, says Socrates, to fear death, as it is our greatest possession on earth, and Seneca adds that it is the best of the inventions of life, while Montesquieu concludes that we should shed tears for men when they are born and not when they die."

M. Henry de Varigny examines the question of longevity in L'Illustration from another point of view. He asks: Has the man of to-day a chance to live longer than the man of 2,000 years ago? He bases his conclusions upon charts and statistics published by Prof. Karl Pearson in Biometrika and upon the researches made by W. Spiegelberg, of Strassburg, on the age of Egyptian mummies. These conclusions are that an Egyptian who 2,000 years ago lived to be 68 years old was likely to live longer than a modern Englishman of the same age. M. de Varigny gives the following explanation:

"Evidently there was among the Egyptians a natural selection, resulting from environment, that does not take place to-day, at least to the same degree, among civilized people. The Egyptians who reached the age of 68 years had robust constitutions, and therefore their chances of longevity were exceptional."

Respectability.

The Destiny of Spiritualism Is to Climb to New and Loftier Heights of Respectability.

A few, happily only a few, Spiritualists have a fear that Spiritualism will become respectable. These few are strong minded, as strong as the few minds that brought on the civil war. This makes the fear worthy of notice.

What is the meaning of respectability? The best of men, ancient and modern, have pronounced it synonymous with character; that without character there would be no respectability; and without integrity good character would be wanting. One may laugh at respectability, but he cannot legitimately ridicule it, any more than goodness, truth and beauty can legitimately be ridiculed. From now and then some article by Clara Watson one might class her with these few fearful men. See what she says in No. 660 of The Progressive Thinker. She says, "I am sure a school officered by intelligent Spiritualists can be so disciplined and conducted as to command the respect of all classes." No other word so weighty of character seems to have occurred to the lady as the word respect. If she is a "holy terror," occasionally, as some say, she shows that she hasn't lost a very fine and delicate sense of the word respect.

Now and then another respectable Spiritualist senses danger because the conservative Spiritualists haven't cast off all of the church forms. The Catholic church on leaving Paganism retained largely of the pagan forms, and then succeeded only after innumerable wars. Martin Luther, departing from Catholicism, not only retained very largely of its forms but retained their God, devil, heaven and hell as well; and succeeded only by great sacrifice of blood and treasure. All new political parties, that succeed, retain old party machinery as much as possible. New social movements recognize the law. Educational reforms are sensitive to this economy of nature, for nature finds the system of doing by habit great saving of time and effort. That which is done from habit is easy and rapid. The sacred family circle is tenacious of much of the old form. It is so easy, and delightful because easy. See how our republican form of government conforms so largely to the monarchial forms. President, Congress, law courts, industrial systems, etc., are counterparts; and the Roman, Napoleonic and English law are adopted with the instinct of wisdom.

The new educational psychology, which is the latest science, demonstrates how much more readily the mind absorbs new ideas through habitual forms. Shows the economy of the law of habit. The Spiritualist college will make the new science prominent in its curriculum. I have all confidence in the faculty. Should they ask which of the latest works I preferred I should say, William James' Psychology, Briefer Course. Professor of Psychology in the Harvard University. It is adopted in other universities. The other modern authors are all good. Prof. James' explanation of the subjects of reason, instinct, concentration, will, attention, association, imagination, etc., is so clear, simple and easy. It is a new revelation. For instance, some others make concentration of the mind an act of the will. Prof. James makes it an entirely different process, and renders it so much easier and natural.

Now and then we hear it said that simply to believe that spirit friends return and communicate does not make one a Spiritualist. This is a bad break. One is as fully a Spiritualist on the first day of conversion as he ever is. Subsequently he learns more of what is back of the phenomena, but gets no stronger conviction. If it is the after knowledge that makes the Spiritualist, then how much? If all knowledge is required then no one is yet a Spiritualist. The question of integrity of character has nothing to do with conviction.

Spiritualism is especially a Sunday movement. At the outset it stepped directly into the shoes of the church. The converted church-goer had but to pass from one door to the other. The ideal of the church had been made real by Modern Spiritualism. It was the other extreme of the Free Thinkers' secular organizations. Yet in many respects there was a blending of the principles of both. For ages it has been manifest that men will have some special Sunday devotion differing from the secular labors. From ancient pagan to the modern Universalist the word church has been a shibboleth. It is a strong word. There is much of the Protestant church that Spiritualism needs. Every Spiritualist Sunday society is a church in all save the name, and that is gradually returning. The pendulum is slowing back from the other extreme.

Would that all men had characters sufficiently estimable to be revered and be called reverend. As to prayer, in its deepest significance, there is no one so mean as not to utter it in his every breath. In the matter of christening, it would do us all good to be christened by nature every day of our lives. And when we come to the name of pastor, it is perhaps the most beautiful term of them all. Its original definition had the healthy, wholesome out-of-doors ring. The pastor looked after the health and comfort of the flocks and herds. When the pastor can as nobly mind the human flocks he should be hailed as man's best friend.

It has been claimed that Spiritualism should proceed like science. To do this would be an impossibility. Without the laboratory science would be lost. Spiritualism would be lost with the laboratory. Mediumship is everything to Spiritualism; it is nothing to science. Science wouldn't know what to do with Emma Rood Tuttle's Lyceum Guide; Mattie E. Hull's songster; and Longley's songs for public meetings. Spiritualism would be crippled without them. Spiritualism is social. Science is unsocial.

The destiny of Spiritualism is to climb to new and loftier heights of respectability. It satisfies a human want beyond all other philosophies. It is crude yet. Give the child a chance. It will break away from the old, not as much, but as little as possible, consistent with maintaining its integrity. By so doing it obtains marked and increased facilities. It avoids so much of abruptness; and of having to learn and grow into so many new ways. It will seek to learn, not how much, but how little, can safely be changed in a given time. Science changes no more than is absolutely necessary and essential. Science knows the advantage of utilizing as much as possible of that to which humanity is already accustomed.

In closing let me allude to a few of all of the excellent articles of the exceptional number 660. Moses Hull's article, every word of it, was a clarion note for more light to dispel the darkness that surrounds Spiritualism. Clara Watson covered a wide and important field with a subject that will receive profoundest attention at the Spiritualist college, the only one on earth that will give it any attention at all. She gives some views of characteristics she thinks would be natural to a college of this nature. I think these views will not receive very much serious objection. They are general rather than specific. They seem intended to reduce diversified knowledge to simplicity. This is what educational psychology does. The university, college, and public school are all one. The subjects taught in the university have their roots in the public school.

As to having the college receive and give its benefits to only such students as are very bright and brilliant, I don't think any one seriously believes it. The public school doesn't reject the children by nature less favored. The orthodox colleges do have examinations and exclude many. Many of those so rejected, in our college, might turn out to be kings. The medium is our shibboleth. The medium is yet far from being the ideal. It will not do to say the spirit world can sufficiently educate us. Clara Watson says, in describing the advantage it is to herself, that she "is in love with the old ways." Well she may be. She is one of those peculiar sensitives that educated spirits can reach and give the benefit of their former labors and struggles for an education. But Clara Watson is one out of five hundred Spiritualists. How about the other four hundred and ninety-nine? Must they forever wander in darkness? Are they of no use to Spiritualism? Are not some of the best speakers not mediums at all, and are made so wise by getting their knowledge from many mediums, thus keeping from getting into a rut? Nearly every medium is in a rut, because they have only one source of supply. The Spiritualists that establish the camp-meetings, officer them, go on the several committees, take care of the grounds, and furnish most of the money for running them, nearly all belong to the four hundred and ninety-nine. It is the same class that establish and run most of the local societies. Must all of these indispensable workers go uneducated to satisfy the one that is satisfied with the "old ways?"

A wholesale grocer told me he would have none but gentlemen in his employ. Said if one of his porters should speak disrespectfully to one of his customers he would discharge him. Are we to see the business man marching on into the light and we continue surrounded by darkness? The farmer is now rising to the idea that his only safety is in a course at the agricultural college. It will not be long before the most menial occupation, if useful, will be considered as respectable as that of being president or governor. It will however have to be done in an up-to-date manner.

There are Spiritualists that have more money than enough to carry them through this life, and they have arranged to leave it, at death, with orthodox institutions. Their reason is that the Spiritualists are yet in such fog and darkness, and are so much lacking in enlightened respectability that they don't feel they would use the money wisely. When the Spiritualists rise as high, ideally, as the farmer has already done, they will have all the money that the cause can use beneficially and advantageously.

All of the uneducated fakirs and frauds are mediums, controlled by their like. Most of the Spiritualists, while they know something about it, are still in woful darkness concerning the dreadful power of obsession. There is one prominent medium that says there is no truth in the doctrine of obsession; but that goes for naught, as the evidence of hundreds of other mediums is against him.

No orthodox denomination needs a college so much as the Spiritualists. But Clara Watson is not what might be inferred from the above. She is all right. She expresses herself strongly and decidedly in favor of education. She gives advice in its favor. She only desires that we move cautiously and thoughtfully. In the article above alluded to she says, "Let the experiment be tried. It seems to me that such an institution of learning could and would receive the co-operation of the Spiritualists at large both with influence and with money. A person taught only upon the principles of Spiritualism in its narrow sense of an ism is not fully equipped for a teacher or minister in Spiritualism, but there needs to be the broad range of general knowledge." I am sure Morris Pratt himself will like this. What Clara says about the use of prayer is not objectionable I am sure. Our public school discarded prayer long ago, and the universities have got so far as to leave it optional with the students whether they will attend prayers. Given a little more time and they will go the rest of the way. Congress too will drop them, but it will take longer, for a congress has less respectability than a university or college.

Irene Clark Safford, in this issue, is full of the beautifully suggestive. The editorial on "Advantages of Superstition," is "meat for strong men." Each of the poems is a gem of illumination. And there are doubtless very few that would consider any number finished till they had read the Hudson Tuttle column.

SPIRIT AND LIFE.

The Eternal Power of Truth.

The poet sings—

"Truth crushed to earth will rise again,
The eternal years of God are hers;
But error wounded writhes in pain,
And dies among its worshipers."

So it is that theories fail; conjectures are exploded; opinions have their day; creeds are confuted; philosophies clash together, and are mutually destructive; the interior thread of light is lost among the clouds, and darkness obscures it for us. Yet the great prophecy goes on, and the grand burden is borne forward from age to age, and the tireless thinkers, the unwearied searchers go about pressing the lamp of faith to their hearts.

Nor is this all. Truth is a tremendous power on earth. Some men call it illusion. Well this illusion, if you call it so, this dream, this fancy, is a prodigious force in human affairs.

Whenever men feel that truth is in the field and against them, they know they are beaten. Whenever they catch sight of its fair white plume in the fight, they know which way the fight goes.

How will you account for it, that the banner on which "truth" is inscribed, carries such a spell, so fascinates men, draws them so mysteriously, impresses upon the soul such an awe? Why is this? Because there is in all of us an abiding though secret faith in the sublime unity of the world. We instinctively believe in law, order, harmony, cause, and effect. I say that instinctively we believe that things have a purpose, are driving toward a result, mean something. When a man begins to seriously doubt this, his interest in the world ceases.

Any book that throws misgivings upon the Divine order and law, we throw down with disgust. Anarchy in the moral sphere is intolerable.

We are all conservative as far as this, that we cannot make Light or Nature tell a lie. We are satisfied with nothing short of a faith that the spiritual constitution of nature is true to the core. That nature holds her own and that the universe rings to one tune.

Hence it is, whenever a strong personality comes and plants himself upon the truth with sincere conviction, we feel that he has an eternal force in him, and such can only come from his being on a line with the movements of God, though he may not know it or call it so. All Truth is consistent.

The accepted proverbs of the world are full of this faith. As an old Indian script has it, "If, at the last day, it should be found that an atom of falsehood remained in the world, the universe would shrivel like a snake's skin to cast it forth forever."

This proverb but expresses a truth which lies near the heart of every human creature.

When William Lloyd Garrison said, in the first number of his Liberator, "I will not equivocate, I will not excuse, I will not retreat a single inch; and I will be heard," there was an end of the case; the key-note had been struck, the man embodied his idea—he did more than embody it, he ensouled it; the power of truth in his individuality, from that moment, was to be felt from the beginning to the end of the struggle.

Luther insisted that certain ideas that he saw in the Bible writings should be heard in Germany. He taught the Bible to speak German. He did well for his day and generation. In like manner it is the business of the modern school of liberal thinkers to make the transcendental facts and realities in nature understood or at least apprehended by men.

The spiritual philosophy must speak in the vernacular.

Look at the position taken by Gotama Siddartha, the "Hermit of the Sakyas," (or Sakya Muni), who has been deified by one-third of the human race on this planet, as the Buddha, or Illuminated Teacher. One of the great family of prophets.

Gotama never thought of denying the inner-life of all things; the sane, Divine constitution of Nature. He denies the imputation of Atheism as an ignorant misconception. He says: "When I lived on earth and taught my disciples as to the relations which the soul maintained towards the Creative Power, I found belief in this principle of Reincarnation of the spirit, so firmly implanted that I deemed it better not to try to remove it by contradiction, although I seriously doubted it, but rather hoped, by directing the mind to the attainment of Nirvana, to enable it to outgrow the influence of the old thought, and thus transfer it from the field of human speculation. I taught that the spirit perfected from the desire of the physical life, and freed from the bondage of sensual passion, imbued with the principles of kindness and beneficence, and emancipated from the influence of anger or revenge, would escape all the necessities of any further embodiment upon earth. I did not teach that its relief would be extinction, nor that the spirit could escape from the condition that would be, to all practical effects upon it, a new incarnation, for some of the wiser minds in spirit that I received ideas from did not deny this when I questioned them, but I sought to raise the thought of my disciples to a loftier ideal than the old doctrines, without wholly denying them."

His idea of post mortem re-embodiment was quite similar to the Spiritualist conception of to-day. It was the development of the inner or finer body set free from its husk at the rebirth of death. The same conscious spirit with its memories and soul history manifesting on a finer grade of matter in nature, but still a material body to all intents and purposes. The blossoming of the soul, or the "breathing out" and eternal freeing of the inner life was quite a different, and a very rare achievement. That was the attaining of Nirvana.

But the development of the psychic body is what interests us here and now. Our material shell is thoroughly permeated by this spirit or electrical substance here, and even a pin's point cannot penetrate our flesh without the spirits' knowledge of it.

The spirit is the life, its extent and capacity are no secret to whoever may choose to study nature's works. The intelligent ant builds a house in the sands of the desert; is a child of the inner life, even as we are. But we possess a wide range of thought, reflection and affection. If we choose to admit it, we have much to be profoundly grateful for.

In this matter let us harbor no vain glory, but rather seek to understand the glory and wisdom of the Power that fashioned the whole universe and leads all good toward his own inner life. Until we have graduated through many births and many deaths, we cannot fathom the grandeur and perfection of the Cosmos. What do "spirits," excarnate and new, die too? From the earthly view point yes—but, if speaking from the heights of Immortal Life, no. And yet in the phantasmal worlds there are indeed, millions endeavoring to learn of the life that is to come after, as we now seek to look beyond the earth burial of our mortal bodies. The germination of our spirits' seed. The spiritual evolution of the Inner-life.

It is for us to say what those spiritual plants shall prove to be.

Shall they be wheat or tares? Corn or weeds? There is no power anywhere in the universe that could produce a harvest of corn from the seed of weeds. Nature is always true to herself. Nature's laws are Rationalistic.

On all the planes of man's being, whether spiritual, physical or mental, she is consistent.

Nature weaves through all conscious existence an eternal thread of ethical nature which makes for rightness or righteousness. There is here a vital influence, for whatever lives loves, and whatever loves is, in so far, a child of the inner, infinite life which is all love, all goodness, all wisdom; the eternal attraction.

Though secondary causes have a beginning yet the permanent element in them is without beginning and is, hence, an eternal or non-temporal cause; entering as an inexpugnable element in all causation.

As J. S. Mill said in one of his posthumous essays:

"For, if it should turn out that, though all causes have a beginning, there is in all of them a permanent element which had no beginning, this permanent element may with some justice be termed a first or universal cause, inasmuch as, though not sufficient to cause anything, it enters as a con-cause into all causation. Now it happens that the last result of physical inquiry, derived from the converging evidences of all branches of physical science, does, if it holds good, land us, so far as the material world is concerned, in a result of this sort. * * * It would seem, then, that in the only sense in which experience supports, in any shape, the doctrine of a First Cause—namely, as the primeval and universal element in all causes—the First Cause can be no other than Force."

Thus again the light of truth is made manifest, science and philosophy join hands, and wisdom has her perfect work.

That which is spiritual is free from time and space limitations. And this eternal power of spiritual truth is well illustrated by Gotama, who, in speaking to this age, says:

"Then the spirit has attained to the power of perfect control of all that belongs to the lower grades of sensation, then approaches the condition I denominated Nirvana. It no longer surges and seethes with passions, nor is it subject to their dominant impulses. In place of violent anger it has a calm serenity of conviction which is well-nigh irresistible in its power of expression. It thinks clearly and consecutively upon subjects presented for its consideration, and expends its vitality in its own mental growth, rather than in vain attempts to impress other minds with the power of ideas beyond their intellectual capacity. It grasps easily what was once considered an impossible realization of spiritual-power, for it has accumulated forces that belong to the previous stages of spiritual experiences as a basis for future explorations in the world of mind.

"It is difficult for the mentality of earthly life to realize that life eternal is a condition where thought power is the great motive agent in action, and that spiritual perfection consists in the cultivation and acquirement of those mental states that produce the most perfect happiness in either world. As the spirit of greedy selfishness upon the mortal plane produces disgust and repulsion, its opposite in spiritual life is essential to the attainment of pleasure and attraction, and so the whole life of the soul is in learning the lessons that teach the spiritual nature the principles that produce a perfect mental balance.

"This may be said to be the whole object of spiritual existence as far as any rational explanation of its nature can be given. The spirit can go forward upon the planes of wisdom and intellectual unfoldment forever. It can remain upon the plane of selfish disregard of the welfare of other souls, but it does so at the expense of its own growth, for singular as it may seem, the process of spiritual accumulation is based upon interchange of experiences and transference of power from spirit to spirit by direct contact of mental atmospheres. In the earth life this power is but dimly sensed, yet some can cultivate it and thereby become spiritually enlightened, as they then are able to obtain ideas from the spirit world without the long and tedious process of having it filtered through earthly channels, that color it with their own imperfect conceptions of it."

In this we see the beauty and benignancy of the truth in its workings in the spirit as known in the purer realms of the true life.

In this primary school of life, it is not the truth one has or thinks he has, but the truth one desires that gives power. In a word it is the spirit of truth, not the letter or form of truth, that one must cherish. The grand thing is, not that a man should know something, but that he should believe something, and feel something.

Let him only resolve to seek the truth, to love it more than pleasure, more than money, more than private flattery, more than public reputation, or popular applause. Let him determine to seek it more earnestly than he seeks any of the goods of this passing life; let him resolve to follow it wherever it leads, to sacrifice pleasure for it or money, or ease or success.

The love of truth is the leader, it is the guide. There is no other. If you would find truth you must love it.

There is no key to truth like love. It is the soul of all truth. It is useless, in this world, to try to find anything out unless you begin with an earnest, loving belief in the thing you seek.

The Naturalist must start with the principle of love, as he feels his way through the mazes of nature's intricate organizations.

As Theodore Parker has said in his own wise way: "The influence of God (or Truth) in nature, in its mechanical, vital, or instinctive action, is beautiful. The shapely trees; the leaves that clothe them in loveliness; the corn and the cattle; the dew and the flowers, the birds, the insect, moss and stone, fire and water, earth and air; the clear blue sky that folds the world in its soft embrace; the light which rides on swift pinions, enchanting all it touches, reposing harmless on an infant's eyelid, after its long passage from the other side of the universe, all these are noble and beautiful; they admonish while they delight us, these silent counsellors and sovereign aids. But the inspiration of God in man, when faithfully obeyed, is nobler and far more beautiful. It is not the passive elegance of unconscious things which we see resulting from man's voluntary obedience. That might well charm us in nature; but in man we look for more. Here the beauty is intellectual, it is the beauty of thought, which comprehends the world and understands its laws; it is moral, the beauty of virtue, which overcomes the world and lives by its own laws; it is religious and affectional, the beauty of holiness and love, which rises above the world and lives by the law of the spirit of life."

THE DEAD ONE'S MESSAGE.

Could now the silence of these lips
Wake into speech once more to-day
With their sweet tones of old-time love,
What last words, think you, would they say?

Weep for me tenderly; for I
Were you here lying in my place,
Would press my warm lips on your brow,
And rain the hot tears on your face.

And when this body's laid away,
I'd have you my low earth-bed make
All fresh with grass and sweet with flowers,
And sacred for the old-time's sake.

But then, sweet friends, look up and on!
Let sunshine all the clouds break through;
And do not, for my sake forget
What for the living you should do!

Let not the shadow of my loss,
Darken the path the living tread.
But let the memories of my past
Still cheer and help, though I am dead.

These ears can hear your words no more,
However fondly you may speak;
For my sake then, with words of love,
The living cheer, and help the weak.

So from the grave I still may speak,
Still help the sorrowing world to bless;
Still live, though dead, and swell the tide
Of human love and happiness.

If a dear voice, which was to us most dear
And failed and faltered but the other day,
Could reach us where we sit and long to hear,
I think that this is what that voice would say.

..GENERAL SURVEY..

THE SPIRITUALISTIC FIELD—ITS WORKERS, DOINGS, ETC., THE WORLD OVER.

CONTRIBUTORS.—Each contributor is alone responsible for any assertions or statements he may make. The editor allows this freedom of expression, believing that the cause of truth can be best subserved thereby. Many of the sentiments uttered in an article may be diametrically opposed to his belief, yet that is no reason why they should be suppressed; yet we wish it distinctly understood that our space is inadequate to publish everything that comes to hand, however much we might desire to do so. That must account for the non-appearance of YOUR article.

WRITE PLAINLY.—We would like to impress upon the minds of our correspondents that The Progressive Thinker is set up on a Linotype machine that must make speed equal to about four compositors. That means rapid work, and it is essential that all copy, to insure insertion in the paper, all other requirements being favorable, should be written plainly with ink on white paper, or with a typewriter, and only on one side of the paper.

ITEMS.—Bear in mind that items for the General Survey will in all cases be adjusted to the space we have to occupy, and in order to do that they will generally have to be abridged more or less; otherwise many items would be crowded out. Sometimes a thirty-line item is cut down to ten lines, and ten lines to two lines, as occasion may require.

Take due notice, that all items for this page must be accompanied by the full name and address of the writer. It will not do to say that Secretary or Correspondent writes so and so, without giving the full name and address of the writer. The items of those who do not comply with this request will be cast into the waste basket.

Keep copies of your poems sent to this office, for they will not be returned if we have not space to use them.

The only opportunity! Don't miss it! G. W. Kates and wife, the noted mediums of the N. S. A., will lecture and give their spirit messages, under the auspices of the Englewood Spiritual Union, 528 W. Sixty-third street, on the night of Wednesday, July 30, 1902, and Thursday, July 31, 1902. Collection at door, 10 cents. The Englewood Spiritual Union have closed their regular meetings until the first Sunday in October. Watch The Progressive Thinker for special meetings when special talent can be secured.

Prairie du Chien, Wis.—Great excitement prevails here over the finding of the skull of a man under a pile of refuse. Dr. McAde, a hypnotist, has been giving exhibitions here the past week and this afternoon put a boy named Bitterdee in a hypnotic state with a view of ascertaining where his father was. The latter had been missing for over four years. The lad while in this state said that his father had been killed and the body was buried at the place mentioned. An examination of the place was made and while excavations were under way a skull of a human being was unearthed. Doctors who examined the skull say it is genuine. Further investigations will be made to morrow, which probably will throw some light on the discovery.—Chicago American.

Owing to an unexpected increase in mail orders and local demands, Capt. Geo. W. Walrond, of Denver, Colo., has been unable to leave the city to fill many country engagements for July. He will leave for the West at the end of July and touch the principal towns and cities between Denver, Col., and the Pacific Coast. He will re-open his large offices again in Denver, Colo., for spiritual and occult work in October next. All mail should be addressed in the meantime to Denver.

Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds writes from Pekin, Ill.: "The New York State Association of Spiritualists will have a State Day at Freeville, N. Y., August 8. Mr. H. W. Richardson, president and Mrs. Tillie U. Reynolds, second vice-president and state missionary, with others, will be in attendance. Wishing all assistance to our State Association from interested friends, we invite a full attendance."

T. W. Woodrow writes from Hobart, O. T.: "The Oklahoma Spiritualist Association started at Hobart, O. T., is growing out of services conducted by Rev. T. W. Woodrow, his wife acting as materializing medium. All persons interested in the movement in Oklahoma are requested to send their names to me."

Frank T. Ripley is now ready for fall and winter engagements to lecture and give spirit messages. He has a few open dates. He can be addressed at 48 West Rich street, Columbus, Ohio, until July 26; after that time to Millersport, Ohio, from July 27 to August 10; after the 10th to September 7, at Ashley, Ohio.

The advent of the automobile was forecasted by Francis Bacon in the sixteenth century, according to Professor George E. Vincent of the University of Chicago. Professor Vincent was discussing "The New Atlantic" in his lecture room yesterday afternoon. According to the professor, this book, written by Bacon contains no end of prophecies of wonderful changes and inventions, all of which have come true. At one place Bacon says that the time will come when ships without sails shall cross the seas. Professor Vincent takes this as a prophecy of the modern steamboat. In another place Bacon asserts that there would be machines for conveyance which should run without horses. Professor Vincent declares this to be the first conception of an automobile.—Chicago American.

A dispatch in the daily papers states that the Rev. Henry Gillingham, pastor of the Atlantic Methodist church, of Atlantic, a small village near Houghton, Mich., after twice being requested to make his sermon brief, preached one of the shortest sermons, if not the shortest, on record, on a recent Sunday evening. He went to the evening service prepared to make a thirty-minute discourse. He was met by one of the members and for the second time was requested to make his sermon short. Mr. Gillingham changed his mind about the thirty-minute sermon. When he arose to announce his text he remarked that he had twice been asked to make his sermon short and he would try to do so. If this was too long, he would stop next time with the text. Then he delivered this sermon: "Text, Luke 16:24: 'And he cried and said, Father Abraham, have mercy on me, and send Lazarus, that he may dip the tip of his finger in water and cool my tongue, for I am tormented in this flame. Three persons, Abraham, Dives, Lazarus. It was hot where Dives was. He did not like it. He wanted to get out. So do we. Let us pray!"

Dr. C. R. Fisk, an active and efficient worker in the field of reform, will receive subscriptions for The Progressive Thinker at the Clinton Camp.

J. D. Pue writes from Ohio: "I think The Progressive Thinker one of the best family instruments on the programme."

Sarah E. Bromwell writes: "The National Sunlight Center Club's basket picnic to St. Joseph, Mich., will be August 2. Boat leaves at 9:30 a. m. Other clubs are cordially invited."

Julia Steelman Nichols is engaged as principal speaker for the entire season at the Kansas camp. She is engaged in Missouri for September. She may be addressed at 749 Wells street, Chicago, Ill.

Fred Landin writes from Spokane, Wash.: "Mrs. A. C. Priest continues to present the higher phases of the spiritual phenomena to an inquiring public at 220 North Post street, Spokane, Wash. It is allowed that our public hall and reading room is a r odel in the way of attraction. The philosophy of Spiritualism is also given by her partner every Sunday evening at 7:30. So we present an attractive program in contrast to itinerants who come and go; dark cabinets, wires, spirits made to order, etc."

Only four unauthorized Congregationist schools now remain in Paris, France. The sisters in charge of those have encouraged demonstrations in their favor, and are determined to remain until they are forcibly expelled. As the limit of delay accorded by Premier Combes' circular expired at noon, July 24, it is likely that decrees ordering the expulsion of the sisters will be placed in the hands of the police at once, and that the execution of these decrees will be accompanied by scenes of violence. Telegrams from the provinces report that the schools in most places have been closed, and that the sisters have departed. At La Force, department of Dordogne, 500 persons, headed by two flags and shouting "Long live the sisters;" and "Hurrah for liberty!" conducted the sisters to the train. Similar demonstrations were made at Toulouse, department of Haute-Garonne, where twenty of the manifestants were arrested; at Lille and Dunkirk, department of the North, and at Grasse, department of Alpes-Maritimes. Of course this movement on the part of the government was inaugurated to overthrow a certain class of religionists who were constantly trying to destroy the Republic.

Mrs. F. E. Luce writes from Philadelphia, Pa.: "Your premium book, 'Religion of Man,' by Hudson Tuttle, arrived in good condition, and I will say, what a storehouse of mental food for $1.25—The Progressive Thinker for one year (weekly) and such a valuable book; it is a fine companion. I am never alone with such a book. I would advise all Spiritualists to take advantage of your offer."

"S. B. McCracken, the well-known historiographer and authority on Michigan law, is lying at the point of death in Harper hospital." "The above," says J. W. Briggs, "appeared in the Detroit Journal. Judge McCracken for years was an active Spiritualist, and a close friend of W. S. Wood, whose obituary appeared a few weeks ago. He has written a great deal in the Detroit papers in defense of Spiritualism, and was a frequent attendant at the services conducted by Marguerite St. Omer Briggs."

Swami Vivekananda, whose death in a monastery near Calcutta was announced July 24, was known in Chicago. His expositions of Hindu philosophy made him a unique figure during the World's Fair congress of religions. He came to America as a delegate to the congress, and was one of its most prominent figures. Long after it had closed he remained in the country preaching and writing. He went to New York, where his Indian costume and new ideas created a furore. He returned to Chicago the year after the congress, to be again welcomed, this time as a "fad." The swami drew great crowds to his meetings, and religious leaders were of the belief that he would create a cult with a large following if he continued. His teachings were deeply philosophical and his method of expressing them clear and concise. He was a man of great personal magnetism, and with his succinct thought and language succeeded in making his influence felt. He dressed in the garb of the Indian Brahmin. This took the form of a long white robe, with the turban headdress. He was a strikingly tall man, erect in carriage, and of light complexion for a Hindu. On the streets he was followed by crowds, and would stop and deliver lectures. When tired he would deliberately stop, even in the middle of an address, and, jumping into a cab, drive away."

Dr. Louis H. Freedman, the Australian Healer, leaves Chicago for Clinton Camp where he will be throughout the season, and will return to his new office at the end of September. His new address will be given in The Progressive Thinker when he returns to Chicago.

Rev. John F. Geddes, a prominent Spiritualist, has removed from Bloomfield, Iowa, to Belleville, Ohio.

Samuel W. Tucker writes from Keokuk, Iowa: "In a late Progressive Thinker there was a communication from J. C. Ferrell, of Portland, Oregon, in reference to the deductions and conclusions of a board of scientific experts appointed by the Agricultural Department of the state of Minnesota to determine the comparative value and digestibility of fine and unbolted flour. They say that the white bread is more nutritious than the brown, which is true in the abstract; but they forgot to say that one will gain flesh faster in consuming the whole wheat bread than in consuming that which is made from the sifted flour. How comes this result? The presence of the coarse bread brings about an irritating, grinding and cleansing effect upon the mucous of the stomach and intestines, whereby a greater amount of secretion and assimilation is secured than can possibly be by the continuous use and consequent clogging effect of the fine flour. I am not a medical doctor, nor a chemist, else I would use technical and scientific terms, but am only a plain old man, lacking only two months of being 83 years old. I am always observant, with great experience, especially in the matter of our present theme—foods and the stomach. It is claimed for the grain of wheat that it contains all which is necessary for the formation of the human body; the silica, which forms the finger and toenails, together with the hairs is found in the hull; hence, the great importance of consuming the whole grain, as found in Graham bread."

When writing for this paper use a pen or typewriter.

A correspondent from the Wonewoc (Wis.) camp writes: "We are having a glorious meeting in this section of the Badger State. It is under the auspices of the Western Wisconsin Camp Association and although this is but the second year of a meeting in Wonewoc, it is not saying too much to predict a great future for the work here. The meeting opened on the 12th ult., and up to the present date, the 23rd, every day has presented a full program and notwithstanding heavy rains, the work has gone on with little interruption. W. J. Erwood, the president of the association, is the right man in the right place; like the president of the Wisconsin State Association, he is a 'hustler.' Mrs. Mattie E. Hull and Mrs. Alfareta Hull Jahnke arrived from Lily Dale, N. Y., at an early date in the meeting and have been hard workers since their arrival. Mrs. Hull conducts the Lyceum work, Mrs. Jahnke has two fine classes in oratory, besides she works daily in the meetings. Mr. Hull arrived yesterday in good condition ready to commence his work. Later, Mrs. Clara Stewart, president of the State Association, and secretary of the Morris Pratt Institute, came among us. Of course, the secretary of this association will report details of the meeting in the future, so I will simply say the work goes well. Wisconsin is rapidly pressing to the front in its support of the Spiritualistic movement."

Mrs. L. C. LeSieur writes: "The Band of Harmony will give a progressive euchre party, at its rooms, 608 Handel Hall Building, 40 Randolph street, Thursday evening, July 31. Six sofa pillows will be given as prizes. Admission 25 cents, including cake and ice cream."

D. D. Wait writes: "I have taken The Progressive Thinker almost from its start. You may consider me a life member. I was prepared to drink in the truths of Spiritualism from its commencement. I started out with Davis' Divine Revelations and all the exposures have never shaken my faith. In its early history we had Achsa Sprague, Nellie Temple, C. Fanny Allyn, J. Madison Allen and others who helped to sow the seeds of truth that to-day are bringing forth a glorious harvest, of which we may feel proud."

Mrs. Anna L. Gillespie writes: "Here I am again in the pleasant home of Brother and Sister Field, 4312 Greenwood avenue, Chicago, to remain until I go to Camp Chesterfield, the third of August. Have had a pleasant and profitable journey over the old workingground of York state and Michigan. During my stay in Port Huron, I was most pleasantly entertained by Mr. and Mrs. Bird Renwick. Mr. Renwick is a splendid medium, and any who have doubts of the genuineness of his manifestations need only to be an inmate of the home as the writer has been, to be fully convinced of the honesty of the medium and his work. He does not advertise and rarely has any pay for his work, but it is certainly among the very best I have witnessed. From Port Huron to North Amherst; then to Lake Brady; then to Freedom and Garrettsville, Ohio; then a flying trip to Pittsburg, Pa.; then dear old Lockport for two days, and to-day finds me a little worn and weary from the trip, but happy over the meeting with old friends and workers. Monday, July 28, at 2:30 p. m., I will give a parlor lecture in Mrs. Field's parlors, to ladies. I hope to see many of the friends at that time."

DEATH.

A Spirit Gives an Account of Her Passing Over.

To the Editor:—My sister, who died in England some sixty years ago, came to me at a materializing seance here, and in reply to my request, promised to give me an account of her passing over, if I would go to a slate-writing medium. I did so, and the following is the message. G. GOODMAN.

Los Angeles, Cal.

INCIDENTS IN ONE'S DEATH.

Just before breathing my last on earth, I heard the most beautiful music and singing, to which I listened with rapt attention, for I had never heard the like before. Suddenly it ceased, and then a glorious burst of sunshine completely enveloped me. Then one of the foremost angels came to guide me over here, and her greeting was: "You are now one of us, and through with the world's cares, so come." Then we started on our homeward journey, but when I saw the dear ones grieving I wanted to stay and comfort them, but my guide answered, "No longer can you remain." So we again started, and I felt as though being wafted upward by the wind, which was explained to me as the power of the ethereal forces which carried us upward. We floated above our loved ones' heads quite a time, going slowly, until finally they disappeared from my view, which then severed the earthly existence. We then entered the golden chariot, which seemed to me like clouds. After being seated we were carried up as a leaf by the wind, to the edge of the River of Life. On descending from the chariot I was again taken by the hand and led to the river brink, where waited a venerable apostle who baptized me in its waters, saying, "Thou art now ready, sister, to resume your journey." Then my guide gave three whistle-calls from the silver horn suspended at her side, which was immediately answered by the boatman on the other side. Then the dip, dip of the oars could be heard, and a lovely shell-like boat came within view, which upon mooring, the boatman extended to me his right hand, saying, "Thou art now ready to enter the life beyond." Immediately I was placed in the center of the boat, and we then started across the river, and on reaching the shining shore, an array of little ones with white flowers guided us, and led the way, while I was seated in a chair wreathed with garlands of white flowers, and carried by four stalwart carriers to the gates of the City of Angels, where we stopped. Then my guide again stepped forward, giving three raps upon the gate, which was immediately answered by two responding raps. The portals were then opened wide for me to enter, and I was taken to the home of my loved ones who had preceded me. Then came the glad reunion of the loved ones who were congenial in the earthly home.

Our home is a partial counterpart of the earthly home, only far more beautiful. We have our duties to perform here, just as upon earth, and mine is to render assistance to mortals who are seeking this glorious truth, so here I rest. Good bye, dear brother. Yours lovingly, ELLEN.

SPIRITUAL CULTURE.

The Flower Garden of the Soul.

Within every soul lies the germ for the beautifying of its own existence; within every heart a tender spot that adds flavor to the beauty.

Flowers without perfume may radiate in the sun and please the observant eye, but graced with sweetest odor they give delight to the whole being.

Men and women have it within their power to extend their influence beyond the mere conventional, the worldly, the material. But it cannot be done by the measure of an unfeeling scholasticism, social standing or wealth.

They may possess all the charms of a garden in fairest bloom, but minus the perfume of human attainment, love, there is nothing to touch the soul with the sympathy needed for lasting effect.

Man wants more than bread to subsist on. Thirst accompanies hunger, and needs appeasing. So the soul has two prime cravings. Truth is one, but sympathy calls as actively for gratification.

It is true we can engender both by our own efforts, for as we sow we shall reap. But a little sympathy unsolicited is never amiss. Thus we may extend it unsolicited.

However, we are often called upon to give it nolens volens. Our duties to family and friends are sympathy created in soul-flowers added to our interior garden, whose perfume constitutes the joys we experience in consequence. Sorrows are those flowers blighted—nipped by circumstances or trials, mistakes or infelicities—too much ardor for self. Unhappiness or discontent are the weeds making their influence felt, and may outrank the flowers in growth if we do not uproot them by denying them sustenance—refusing to obey their solicitations.

As dereliction of duty or self-love withers the flowers so the denial of any selfish craving or passions kills the weeds, and makes room for the implanting of more flowers. And every sacrifice adds perfume to them, which exudes its benign influence on our surroundings.

It is that influence which rules beyond the worldly and makes man feel his power among all classes of human entities, whatever their prerogatives.

A white sepulchre with all its educational polish cannot brook the soul impetus of a mother who sells her favorite flowers to purchase food for her children. An autocrat cannot downface the honest look of the laborer, who pawns his watch to purchase stimulants for a dying wife. Wealth cannot purloin the happiness of either attained by their sacrifices.

God's garden—nature—is strewn with the seeds of love from which immortelles grow that never fade—never droop. And a human sacrifice is of this seed. Its effect cannot be effaced.

Experience engenders a truth, but love creates a principle beside it that gives it force in expression and gratification to the possessor. Some may reject it, but it obtains. They cannot exclude it forever. In the silence of rest it haunts them, for its influence has made itself manifest—has touched the soul and reveals itself uninvited. Such is the power of truth supported by love, and he who sympathizes naturally has an open door to such truths unsolicited. He is always under inspiration, as it were, or cannot avoid them. He simply dwells in an atmosphere of soul-gardening and inhales the sweets of their blooming with every heart-beat.

Nature has provided for her obedient sons and daughters, and blesses them thus, though the uninitiate may reject them or refuse them aid. And even this is favorable to them, for it is an imposed sacrifice—an added suffering that makes the ground fallow for more flowers that send their sweet perfume upward in the shape of still higher truths.

We cannot rob the godly, the patient, the enduring. We only retard our own progress by the effort, and implant weeds in our own soul's garden by opposing them. If they are not the "chosen," they are phenomenally favored and can afford to smile at our folly in trying to discourage them.

Such are happy in themselves, and their happiness makes them forgiving. Thus we cannot down them. They have the truth on their side constantly, for they live it in applying forgiveness to it. This makes them strong and we are at their mercy in ways unknown to us. Their sympathy may not be wanted as long as we can override them in our worldly power. But the end is certain, with eternity before.

The tiniest flower from their soul's garden may prove a boon to us in the future, as a drop of water was to the rich profligate from poor Lazarus.

But these are extreme cases. Every soul has love, and all are growing flowers that must bring them some blessing. Our trials uproot the weeds; for nature also plays gardener for us, when unaware of her kind mission. She is still the mother of her child, despite its shortcomings. She, too, would sacrifice her flowers for our welfare in that she represents infinite love.

She gave to man an Eden—a paradise. It has never been lost. It exists within and only needs cultivating. Its gateway is the human heart. Through it we pass into the flower-garden of the soul. ARTHUR F. MILTON.

Waukesha Camp, Wis.

The camp-meeting of the Wisconsin State Spiritualist Association opens at Waukesha, Saturday, August 2, and continues throughout the entire month. Arrangements have been made with the Western Passenger Association whereby visitors to the camp may obtain a rate of one fare and a third for the round trip.

In order to obtain this concession it will be necessary for a hundred people to visit the camp before the 6th of August. These must come from points, from which the one way fare to Waukesha is 50 cents or more.

For each ticket purchased, the purchaser must procure a certificate, and this must be turned over to the secretary as soon as you arrive on the grounds. Now friends, the above explanations are important, and you will do well to read them carefully.

The Waukesha camp will offer a splendid opportunity to all who desire a profitable outing. The program is of the very highest order, and all who visit this camp-meeting may be assured that everything possible will be done to make that visit a pleasant one.

Lake Brady Camp.

On July 13 the new Camp Brady was informally opened by Mrs. L. Gillespie, well-known speaker. Mrs. Z. Holles, acting chairman, in an address welcomed the speaker, workers and audience to the new home.

Lake Brady camp that has been in continuous operation in the summer season since 1891, has been moved to a tract of land leased from the owner of Lake Brady farm. A new company is now struggling to again bring the most noted camp into a firm financial basis, as well as to an intelligent and spiritual standing. The meetings are held in a spacious tent in the midst of one of the most fascinating and poetical groves in eastern Ohio. A number of families from Cleveland, Alliance, Ravenna, are living in cottages on the old camp ground, now leased from Mr. Kellogg by a company who have converted it into a summer resort, known as the Electric Park Resort from the fact that it is connected with Cleveland, Akron, Kent and Ravenna by an electric railway. This affords easy transit to the Spiritualists camp.

Mrs. Gillespie spoke at 10:30 a. m., July 13.

In the afternoon, Mrs. Gillespie read a poem, and her control gave a lecture upon the thought given in the poem, which also formed the subject, "What Is in a Name?" At the close of the lecture, she gave messages from the dear ones "over the river," with descriptions of them as they were in this life.

On Monday, July 14, the Woman's Association elected officers for the year 1902-1903, and pledged themselves to assist Lake Brady camp financially and spiritually. The camp is offered the pleasure of the social hall given each evening at the pavilion by the Electric Park company, and the daily afternoon matinee and evening theatre. The little steamer carries many campers with the pleasure seekers, across the little lake.

A few seance meetings have been held, with prospects for more in the future. The Saturday afternoon conference was omitted, owing to the inclemency of the weather.

On July 20, the lecture given by Mrs. A. Coffman, was very highly appreciated by the large audience. While no subject was given, the thought presented was connected in a logical order and much was said to assist the children of existence on to progression.

At 2 o'clock, Mrs. Coffman again addressed the camp. She dwelt upon the proof of spirit return by a chain of reasoning from biblical history. At the conclusion she gave a number of messages, all of which were recognized. Many visitors from Cleveland, Salem, Alliance, arrived on the morning excursion train, and many were busy seeking mediums to ask guidance in social and business matters.

Mr. J. L. Kingsbury, of Willow, Ohio, has purchased a cottage of Mr. Butler, of Braceville, who is now connected with the Florida camp, and will in the near future live here during the camp season.

Mr. D. A. Herrick, of Lake Brady, opened Briggs Park camp, Michigan, and will be the chairman of that camp until he returns to lecture here on the 10th of August.

Mrs. Nellie Mosier of Brady is at present laboring in Wisconsin and will remain until October.

MRS. L. L. CURTIS.

Woman Suffrage the Outcome of Civilization.

Woman suffrage is a part of the movement of the race along its predestined path of progressive civilization. Fifty years ago or so, women were uneducated, and had all their hands could do in the homes of the land. To-day women are educated, and their homes have been almost completely stripped of domestic occupation, by the factories. Carding, spinning, weaving, bleaching, dyeing, tailoring, knitting, embroidering, etc., then done in the homes, are now done in the factories. Soapmaking, candle-making, laundrying, cooking, preserving, canning, etc., then done in the homes, are now done in the factories. In short, the work of the home has been completely revolutionized by modern invention and machinery. Education, fifty years ago in the hands of men exclusively, is now in the hands of women; all callings and all professions now know her presence and skill. Woman suffrage is but one element of this whole movement, and as natural as sunlight after sunrise.

Women now earn wages, possess property, belong to trades unions, have direct interests in all legislative bodies, because of the foregoing changes. To protect her wages and her property, to equalize her interests and her rights to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, she needs the ballot just as much as man, and for the very same reasons.

This movement is consequently co-extensive with civilization. The women of Europe very generally stand on the same footing as the men. Women of Norway have full suffrage; women of Great Britain vote on everything and for all offices, except members of parliament. The women of the United States living in Utah, Montana, Wyoming and Idaho have full suffrage, and those living in other states have some form of partial suffrage. The women of the rising new commonwealth of Australia and New Zealand have equal suffrage. Thus we see that woman suffrage is a race movement, a fundamental movement involving the welfare and whole well-being of womankind, and through them the welfare of humanity at large.—J. O. Stevenson in Woman's Standard.

THE Kola Plant CURES HAY FEVER AND ASTHMA.

The Kola Plant.

FREE. The African Kola Plant is Nature's Positive Cure for Hay-fever and Asthma. In the short time since its discovery this remarkable botanical product has come into general use in the hospitals of Europe and America as an unfailing specific cure for Hay-fever and Asthma in every form. Its cures are really marvelous. Dr. W. H. Vail, a prominent physician of St. Louis, Mo., writes March 8th, 1902, that he used Himalya on six different Hay-fever patients last fall with satisfactory results in each case. Mrs. M. A. Scott, Crosby, Mich., writes March 6th, 1902, that Himalya completely cured her after fifteen years persistent suffering of Hay-fever and Asthma. Rev. J. L. Combs of Martinsburg, W. Va., wrote to the New York World, July 23rd, that Himalya cured him of Asthma of thirty years' standing. Mr. Alfred C. Lewis, editor of the Farmer's Magazine, Washington D.C., was also cured, although he could not lie down for fear of choking, being always worse in Hay-fever season. Hundreds of others send similar testimony proving Himalya truly a wonderful remedy. As the Kola Plant is a specific constitutional cure for the disease, Hay-fever sufferers should use it before the season of the attacks when practical, so as to give it time to act on the system. If you suffer from Hay-fever or Asthma, in order to prove the power of this new botanical discovery, we will send you one trial case by mail entirely free. It costs you absolutely nothing. Write to-day to The Kola Importing Co., No. 1162 Broadway, New York.

QUESTIONS AND ANSWERS.

This department is under the management of

HUDSON TUTTLE,

Address him at Berlin Heights, Ohio.

NOTE.—The Questions and Answers have called forth such a host of respondents, that to give all equal hearing compels the answers to be made in the most condensed form, and often clearness is perhaps sacrificed to this forced brevity. Proofs have to be omitted, and the style becomes thereby assertive, which of all things is to be deprecated. Correspondents often weary with waiting for the appearance of their questions and write letters of inquiry. The supply of matter is always several weeks ahead of the space given, and hence there is unavoidable delay. Every one has to wait his time and place, and all are treated with equal favor.

NOTICE.—No attention will be given anonymous letters. Full name and address must be given, or the letters will not be read. If the request be made, the name will not be published. The correspondence of this department has become excessively large, especially letters of inquiry requesting private answers, and while I freely give whatever information I am able, the ordinary courtesy of correspondents is expected. Oliver Cressman: Q. What of the "Friar Lands" in the Philippines, and why is it necessary for the United States government to consult the Pope about their disposal?

A. These lands belonged to the Roman Catholic church. The priests of that church had come to own about everything in the Philippines, bringing about almost as complete possession as during the medieval ages in Europe. The Spanish government was able to hold the natives only through the power of the priesthood. It really received what the rapacity of the church left. When the Islands came into the possession of the United States, this ill-gotten property should have been confiscated for the good of the state. The activity of the priests in stirring up vindictiveness against the government furnished sufficient cause, and the welfare of the Islands demanded it.

But there are something like two millions of Catholic voters and our officials are afraid to offend the church which can by a word turn this balance of power against them. Hence the Pope must be consulted. He should not be, any more than the Grand Lama, nor would he be, were the office holders of this country more than office seekers. That our government before acting, consults Rome, is a disgrace which ought to cause every true American citizen to blush with shame.

M. R. H.: Q. What is the difference between Spiritism and Spiritualism?

A. Spiritism, often used as synonymous with Spiritualism, has in reality a vividly different meaning. As received by the Latin or Kardec school, it means the acceptance of the doctrine of reincarnation as a cardinal principle. The term has also been employed to designate those who demand phenomena, as tests, rather than the philosophy of spirit.

Spiritualism is the belief in the continuity of life after death, and its continual progress, and the application of this belief—or knowledge—to the right conduct of living. Modern Spiritualism stands for the supremacy of law, in the realm of spirit, as in physical. The departed are near, and communicate with their earth-friends, not by permission, but by law. It is the science of life, and a religion in as much as it would build up moral character on the foundation of knowledge, and is satisfied only with the attainment of perfect excellence, is superior to all others.—From Arcana of Spiritualism.

M. and J. T. Buchanan, Queensland, Australia: Q. Recently while recovering from a severe sickness, we thought, had I passed to a higher life, what service could my friends have held? They could not, more than I tolerate the old form, and there is only one family of Spiritualists near. As the occasion may come, will you inform us if there is any form of service specially prepared, and oblige your friends under the Southern Cross?

A. The Lyceum Guide has a ritual prepared expressly for such occasions, with many appropriate songs, with the music, and selections which may be read by some friend present.

Julia H. Johnson, Home, Wash.: Q. What is the explanation of the manifestations among the Shakers in the years '37 to '47? Were they modern or ancient?

As a matter of fact, spiritual manifestations among the Shakers began with the founder of that church, Mother Ann Lee, who was a remarkable trance medium. I have often thought that it was not correct to make the rappings at Hydesville the beginning, for there have been similar spiritual manifestations all along the ages. In every instance it was found that the world was not prepared for the full revelation. Perhaps no medium of modern times has been more susceptible to spirit influence than John Wesley, founder of Methodism. He started out in a full tide of inspiration, and Methodism was distinctively a spiritual movement. It might have continued to be, and been the initiative of a wonderful development, but it was overwhelmed by the conflicting forces of the world and became a Protestant sect, fast losing its distinctive character.

In a similar manner the spiritual intelligences planned to introduce a correct knowledge of spiritual life through Ann Lee. Their motives were to establish a world-religion, best and purest, but they were not wise in their choice of an instrument, or accepted the best at hand. Socially she was not in a position to command respect, and intellectually capable of a perfect understanding of the thoughts she received.

The habits and customs of the Shakers conduce to spiritual impressibility, and the power has remained with them, but it has not been as conspicuous as in the mother founder, unless we accept the period from '37, when a great variety and of wonderful force were common occurrences. Had the community brought these phenomena before the world instead of holding them under the bushel of their narrow membership, Hydesville would have been inconsequential. But they chose to retain the movement for themselves. The intelligences advocated the doctrines of Shakerism, and after a time became conscious of the error they had made and withdrew. It is pertinent to remark that their revelations became colored by Shakerism.

But lowly as was the social status of the family at Hydesville, from the first there was no coloring of the communications. There was a new philosophy of spirit taught from the beginning. The conduct of life and the triumph over death were not matters of religion—of faith, but of law, of knowledge. There has been no recession, but constant divergence; a stronger and more complete statement that law rules supreme as over spirit and the spirit world.

As far as the manifestations received by the Shakers taught this doctrine, they are modern; so far as they supported the old religious dogmas, they belong to the past.

John Morrissey: Q. (1) Are there any mediums who give their services to the poor? If not, how are these people to be gratified in their great desire to hear from their spirit friends?

(2) Does Spiritualism favor the doctrine of reincarnation?

A. (1) There are no professional mediums to my knowledge, who make a practice of giving their services to the poor. But mediumship is not a monopoly of the wealthy. The greatest mediums were reared in poverty. The advent of Modern Spiritualism was in the cottage of toilers for bread. The way is open to the poor as well as the rich if they but take the opportunity and form circles for themselves.

(2) Spiritualism does not endorse reincarnation. On the contrary its fundamental principles are in direct opposition.

H. Augir: Q. Were the ancient Egyptians a black people?

A. The Egyptians were of two distinct types, neither of which belonged to the black race. The common people or peasantry were like the modern Fellah, who at present inhabit that country. As depicted in the mural paintings they appear to have been identical, and for all these thousands of years to have remained unchanged. These were the original inhabitants, not negroes, but with some affiliation thereto. They were overpowered by a superior Semitic tribe, who afterward formed the ruling class. The sculptures and mummies show that this higher class were of the white race, presenting purest specimens of its highest type.

The Arabic, Assyrian, Phenician and even Greek features are represented. The "Pharaohs" as depicted are of purest type of the white race.

Irene Dobson-Salvator.

As the morning star paled before the rising sun on Tuesday, July 15, 1902, the spirit of Irene Dobson-Salvator winged its way to another world, and was lovingly received in the arms of the spiritual forces through whose instrumentality this medium has been, for a long time, able to give comfort and happiness to so many people on the earth plane.

Born forty-six years ago, of distinguished Southern parentage, the child grew to womanhood, married and was given in marriage, lost husband, home and happiness, passed through trials and tribulations of almost every nature, until the forces were revealed to her some ten years ago, by Dr. Charles Beckwith, formerly practicing physician of Cleveland, Ohio, and who, in the world of spirits, has since been one of her principal guides, particularly so in the healing of the sick ones of earth. Subsequently there came into her vibrations an English clergyman, Dr. Henry Ward Linn, the celebrated John B. Gough, and others, among them being the well-known and truly-beloved little Indian boy, Mohawk.

To the thousands of the earth's inhabitants who have laughed and wept, and wept and laughed again, who have been consoled, encouraged and made happy by the messages brought and given by this ever cheerful, ready-witted lad, the thought that never again can he communicate through his dear medium, will bring sorrow untold.

Of sweet personal appearance, possessed of more than ordinary intelligence in everything pertaining to mature womanhood, Irene Dobson-Salvator was one of the most lovable of God's creatures.

On July 3 of this year she was married to Ernest Salvator, a true and constant friend of several years' standing, and who is heart-broken over his great loss.

Taken ill on July 8, she was, by direction of a physician, taken to a hospital and on the 13th inst. operated upon for supposed appendicitis. Her frame, always frail and delicate, was unable to stand the surgical shock, and all that was material in her ceased existence in the early morning of July 15.

Her inanimate remains were tenderly cared for, and loving hands deposited them in Oakwoods Cemetery, Chicago, on the afternoon of Thursday, July 17, 1902.

The floral tributes to her memory were numerous and beautiful, but the tribute of tears of the lonely ones left behind was the most precious offering that could have been bestowed.

That this dear spirit may at some time return to whisper her own words of loving kindness, is the heartfelt prayer of all friends and true believers in God "who doeth all things well."

THE PROGRESSIVE LYCEUM

To the readers of The Progressive Thinker:—Since calling your attention to "The Progressive Lyceum" paper to be published for Lyceum work and to contain "Life Studies" of our good faithful workers, not a few letters of encouragement and promise of support have been received. Not a sufficient number of subscriptions, however, are guaranteed to justify the publication, so I come to you through the columns of our valuable Progressive Thinker, asking for the names of all who will subscribe; especially do I want to hear from the Lyceum conductors over the country as to how many copies they can use. All is in readiness for publication and we hope for the guarantee subscription list by September 1. No money is wanted until the first issue is delivered, only the promise of subscription or a number of copies for your Lyceum.

Remember that the Reward of Merit Cards bearing the photo and saying of Andrew Jackson Davis are ready at one cent each. Please let us hear from you in regard to this all-imporatnt subject; the Lyceum movement must not be neglected any longer. Reliable publishers have this matter in charge, and when it once starts there will be no doubt as to its continuance. Calls have come from almost every State in the Union since the notice made just a few weeks since, and the movement is certain to fill the long felt want of a suitable supply of matter for the Lyceum work.

Do not delay but send in your name or the names of several in your community at once. JOHN W. RING.

AN OPTICIAN

Relates His Peculiar Experience.

To the Editor:—A few evenings ago while the writer and several friends were discussing different subjects, Spiritualism and its phenomena came up, experiences and opinions expressed and exchanged, and its so-called mysteries discussed. Among the experiences mentioned, some of those of Mr. L. Benedict, an optician of Cleveland, Ohio, were very interesting to us and I believe worthy of publication.

Said he: "To have them fully understood I will have to go back some years. My professional duties called me to Pontiac, Mich., a town in which I usually stopped a week or ten days. I had nearly finished my business there, and the next town on my route and to which I made periodical trips; was Grand Rapids. I had also, as it was my custom, advertised my coming in two papers in that city, but having finished my business at Pontiac sooner than usual, I had two days to spare. On the morning of my first leisure day two ladies, strangers to me, came to my office in the hotel and had their eyes fitted. The ladies told me they were from Saranac, a small town located between Pontiac and Grand Rapids, and before leaving insisted on my visiting Saranac, and promised me that if I would do so they were quite sure several of their friends would have their eyes fitted. Having the two days of leisure, I concluded to do so, leaving Pontiac on an evening train and arriving at Saranac about 10 p. m. I went at once to the hotel, then to my room to bed.

"The next morning after dispatching my breakfast I went out of the office and took a seat on the porch, and after sitting there a few moments a boy came across the street and spoke to the hotel proprietor, asking him if there was an optician stopping with him. To which the hotel man said he did not know unless the stranger on the porch was an optician. Remember, please, that up to that time I had not told any one my occupation, and was somewhat surprised at the boy's question, since even the two ladies I met at Pontiac did not know that I was there. I then said to the boy that I was an optician. He then said to me that the gentleman living in the large house across the street wished to see me. I at once crossed the street, went up to the door and pulled the door-bell and was met by a very fine old gentleman who courteously received me, invited me in, asking me if I was not Mr. Benedict, the optician. In reply I told him I was, and stated my surprise at his knowing and calling me by name. To which he said, 'Never mind about that; I want to know if you have glasses and your instruments with you. I am badly in need of a pair of glasses and would like to be fitted, and after you do so I will explain to you how I knew you and of your arrival.' I then returned to the hotel and got my instruments, glasses, etc. After fitting him and he being well pleased he paid me.

"Now comes the greatest mystery of my life, since I knew at that time comparatively nothing of the philosophy and phenomena of Spiritualism. He said, 'Mr. Benedict, my eyes have been difficult to fit, several opticians failing to fit them with the proper glasses, but now I can see and read with more satisfaction than I have for years.' He continuing said, 'While attending a spiritual seance a while back I asked a spirit friend where I could get my eyes properly fitted, and was informed by the spirit that within a short time they, the spirits, would impress a Mr. Benedict and a competent optician of Cleveland, Ohio, to stop at Saranac, and in fact mentioned the exact date upon which he would arrive, therefore I sent the boy to the hotel to see you, feeling confident that you were there.' This was indeed strange to me and I asked myself what did it mean. 'Now,' said he, 'Mr. Benedict, you will have to excuse me for a few moments.' He soon returned from another room, bringing with him a photo, saying, 'This picture was handed to me by a medium in New York City, with instructions to hand it to you when you arrived at my house, and to say to you that the photo was a likeness of one of your guardian angels.' He then handed the photo to me, and to my great surprise it was a correct likeness of my father, who had been in spirit life for several years. Great heavens, I thought, and what does all this mean? He continuing said, 'The medium said to me that it was your spirit friend's wish that you place the photo in a pocket next to your person and there keep it, and that so long as you kept it with you no harm would befall you. He also said that until the likeness shall have faded and all the outlines obliterated, that then and not until then would you be called to join the loved ones on the other side of life.'"

At this juncture Mr. Benedict exhibited the photo, which was badly faded. Mr. Benedict tells me that he is now in his seventy-fifth year, but hale and hearty and more active than many men at the age of fifty. He also informs the writer that he has carried out to the letter the instructions given him from the spirit side, first through the medium to the old gentleman and then through him to Mr. Benedict. Mr. Benedict also says that during his many years of travel on land and water that he has never met with an accident, yet he has been in several railway wrecks but came out without a scratch, and attributes his good luck in that respect and many others to his obeying wise counsel from the spirit side of life.

Maple Dell Camp, O.

To the Editor:—Please tell the people through your valuable paper, about the beauties of this restful camp. God was lavish with his gifts here, and this is just the place for our young mediums; they cannot get homesick, and it is just the place for unfoldment and to grow better and stronger, to take the place of our older ones who have gone over to return in spirit to help them. About ten have passed over in the last year.

We have such good, comfortable cottages, and the hotel cannot be surpassed for good, clean rooms and beds. The auditorium is just lovely, good hard-wood floor, large rostrum, well seated with chair and school seats. None better adapted for the comfort of the audience. Large and airy, and sheltered by the largest and loveliest of maples; well-named, Maple Dell.

Just the place for our young mediums, and they are not on the back seats but pushed to the front. By the death of some of the owners of cattages there are three or four for sale. Now is the time for young mediums to become identified with this lovely camp and become stockholders and have a voice in the good work.

The spirit loved ones call me here, and I am going to take root and remain and grow strong with them. Come and see for yourselves.

IMPORTANT MATTER FROM OUR FOREIGN EXCHANGES

HARBINGER OF LIGHT, MELBOURNE, AUSTRALIA.

WHAT IS BEING DONE IN SPAIN.

We have received from the Centro Barcelonea a programme of a festival which is to be celebrated in that city on the 18th of May, under the title of a "Competition, and Spiritualistic Floral Sports." It is to be a tournament of Art, Science and Virtue, engaged in with the arms of Beauty, Knowledge and Goodness; in which seventeen prizes will be offered to all comers whether Spanish, Portuguese, French or Italian. The first will be called the prize of honor and courtesy, and will consist of a simple flower, to be presented to the writer of the best poem on a spiritual subject; the winner being entitled to name the lady who shall be proclaimed the Queen of the Festival. The ordinary prizes consist of articles of plate, works of art and books; there being only two money prizes, both purses of coin, which will be awarded the first to the young artisan who shall prove that he has maintained his aged parents for the greatest number of years by his own unassisted labor; and the second to the orphan girl who shall have rendered similar services, in an eminent degree, to her brothers and sisters. The following is a list of the other objects of competition:

1. The best treatise on the necessity for organization among Spiritualists and the advantages it offers.
2. The best fly-leaf for distribution under the title of "Reincarnation."
3. The best essay on the errors of official science as made manifest by Spiritualism.
4. The best essay on the wife as judged by a spiritual criterion.
5. The best essay in prose or verse on the excellencies of the worship of the Father in spirit and in truth, as proclaimed and practiced by Jesus our Lord and Master.
6. The best essay on free will and human responsibility.
7. The best disquisition on this theme: Given the eminently moral character of Spiritualism, can he be considered a perfect adept in the doctrine who is exclusively preoccupied with its scientific aspect?
8. The best pamphlet entitled "Introduction to the Study of Spiritualism."
9. The best poem on the following questions: "What are we? From whence did we come? And whither are we going?"
10. The best words and music for a spiritual hymn.
11. The best poem setting forth the consolations which spiritual communications supply to incarnate beings.
12. The best essay on mediumship in its different phases.
13. The best booklet for children, which, without alluding to Spiritualism, shall inspire them with the excellencies of its doctrine.
14. The best work on the plurality of existences of the soul.

We may infer from the institution of such comprehensive competitions as these, the magnitude of the number of those who, in Barcelona and elsewhere, are interested in the subject of Spiritualism; as otherwise, they could not be expected to be attended by any satisfactory degree of success. Nine of the prizes are offered by gentlemen prominently identified with it, four by associations of Spiritualists, and one by the review "Luz y Union," which is the local organ of two of these bodies. In fact, Spiritualism seems to have seized hold upon the cultivated classes of society in Roman Catholic countries more firmly than upon Protestants in Europe, and much more stress is laid by them upon its moral and religious bearings than upon mere phenomena.

INTERESTING PHENOMENA.

Madame Larrien contributes to "Le Progres Spirite" some remarkable experiences she had while residing at Toulouse, before she or her sister knew anything of Spiritualism. One of these was as follows: "My sister, waking from sleep, said, I dreamt that I saw, with intense distinctness, a woman of our village, our neighbor, and well known to all our family. She was stretched out in a coffin, her arms crossed upon her breast, and I observed a robe and a shawl which I recognized. A patch was very noticeable on the shawl, which was shabby, for she was very miserly. That part of her apparel was particularly remarked by my sister. She rose up from her coffin, and said to me in the patois, which she always spoke: 'Pauline, I am dead! I love you so much, I have come to see you!' She lay down again, with her arms folded, became immoveable, and my sister awoke greatly agitated. Next day we received a letter from my father, who was practicing as a doctor in the village inhabited by the woman, in which he said: 'We have had a painful shock this morning. They came for me to help open the door of X., which was locked; and we found she had been dead for some hours. She must have died suddenly in the night, without having been ill on the previous evening.' Now it was in that same night of her death that my sister had seen her, at a distance of upwards of 180 miles from us. My sister is not a medium that I know of. She is very strong, very robust, and very much occupied with the material affairs of her household."

The following is exceedingly interesting as showing the extent to which some sensitives will "take on" the symptoms of the maladies of those with whom they are brought en rapport:

"Last winter I made the acquaintance of a young woman, who went off very easily into a magnetic sleep. I greatly desired to ask her some questions concerning a poor invalid who had been given up by the doctors, and was very dear to me. The young woman, seeing my chagrin, hesitated, but presently, being aware of the courage with which I held to my belief, prepared me for the misfortune, which afterwards befell me, in such terms and in language so elevated, that I felt myself, on listening to it, endowed with superhuman strength. At my solicitation, she revealed to me the nature of the malady, her diagnosis agreeing with that of the doctors, but—and this was the strange part of it—she told me that he would not die in one of the numerous and dangerous crises to which he was subject, but that he would live for some time longer, and would pass away very suddenly, when I least expected it. When asked to be more precise, she replied that he would live longer than a month and less than a year. I had not the heart to go further with my inquiries. In spite of what she had told me, I very often trembled during the distressing crises which he underwent; and when his life appeared to be about to abandon him. But his death did not occur until three months after the prediction—very suddenly, while he was speaking to me—struck down by a rupture of the heart.

"From the day on which my clairvoyant had foretold that frightful denouement, she had never ceased from suffering a pain in her own heart; and she passionately besought news of the invalid. I was at a distance. I wrote to her two days before his death, sending her a more reassuring bulletin. In fact, my patient, after two months' confinement to the house, had wished to go out on the last days of his life, and I was quite happy to observe it. On the day of his death, the clairvoyant was seized with pain, weak at first, but increasing in the afternoon, and after nine o'clock in the evening it was so acute that she believed she was about to die, and her husband was greatly alarmed, not knowing what to do for her relief. At ten o'clock, and quite suddenly, she experienced a feeling of comfort and of immediate calm, as if she had 'just returned to life,' as she told me, and they were surprised at this condition so abruptly succeeding the previous agitation. Here is the explanation: At more than 180 miles distant, my invalid died suddenly at ten o'clock in the evening, and my poor little friend, so identified with his sufferings, immediately felt the benefit of his deliverance. Marvellous, was it not?"

MORRIS PRATT INSTITUTE

It Means Progression, Not Retrogression.

Man is a progressive being. He is not and cannot be retrogressive. True, some may linger a long time in the realms or on the borders of superstition and mental servitude; and even the influences of ignorance, selfishness and grasping greed may seemingly hold controlling numbers as within an iron grasp, or perhaps leave a lingering influence to vitiate the thoughts, ideas and efforts of those who are hopefully striving to be progressive and endeavoring to help lead the world of humanity upward to a still higher growth.

But this state of undevelopment is only transitory, while truth and love, justice and right, the principles of universal brotherhood, are eternal. These are destined in the good future to shine forth in their full untarnished beauty and brightness, and become more fully the controlling forces in all departments of our civilization.

Those of us who think we stand in the vanguard of human progress, must continue to work patiently, calmly and with loving kindness, ever bearing in mind that progress to still higher conditions is made through the gradual, silent workings of natural law, which operates through the hopes, aspirations, intelligence, the love and good will, the applied force and energy of the human heart and mind; never carelessly ignoring the thought that wise unseen intelligences are trying to guide us in the work.

Wonderful strides of advancement have been made in the mechanical and chemical sciences which are being applied to the advantages of man; to add to the accumulating wealth of the world; and which should be so directed and applied as to make every man, woman and child more grand, noble and intelligent, more healthy, comfortable and happy, more kind, loving and generous.

And when this is done it will be because we have progressed beyond the plane of selfishness, outgrown the influences of ignorance and superstition, and are no longer held in servile subjection to those heathenlike forms and ceremonies that are only in keeping with the conditions of a childhood race; conditions nowise favorable for the clearest spiritual discernment; conditions we must, can and will outgrow.

And it is an improved form of education that we must, can and will have; the system and influence of which will be more favorable than any yet established to develop and encourage the fullest flow of inspirational thoughts and the clearest conceptions of truth that the human mind is capable of.

It is truth and truth only, well applied and directed, that can lead humanity upward to the highest, grandest and noblest advancement.

During the past fifty years or more the spirit world has been working more visibly than ever before in this direction, doing the very best that was possible, considering the mortal minds through which the work had to be done, if done at all. None of them claimed to be perfect, or thought that he or she knew it all; nor does any one now claim perfection or superabundant knowledge.

The Morris Pratt Institute here in Whitewater, Wis., is a glorious result of spirit power, guidance and wisdom; unseen intelligences with wisdom, knowledge and power far greater than mortal acquirements, have been directing their influences upon spiritually receptive minds to bring about its consummation. It means progression and not retrogression; and I feel prompted to predict that a goodly number of the students that are to be educated in or graduated from this institution will, through their liberal education and spiritual unfoldment, be led to bless the world through a greater power of thought, knowledge and inspiration than has yet been demonstrated in this spiritual dispensation.

The best of instructors obtainable will do painstaking work and encourage the utmost freedom of thought and expression.

But when were the plans and arrangements, the ideas and details, of any great work ever complete at the outset? Careful thought, other ideas, amendments and revisions have led to greater and still greater results in the past and will continue to do so in the future. Idle fault-finding, peevishly expressing doubts and declaring all efforts of no avail, never did any good work.

So let us all who feel interested in building a stronger foundation and a more perfect structure of Spiritualism give this subject our best thoughts and generous support. Then we shall be glad in the good future for having done so. Glad not only in the remaining years of this mortal life, but gloriously glad and happy in the work that will have been accomplished when we have joined the great majority who are always working to bless humanity.

BEYOND THE VAIL

A Sequel to "Rending the Vail."

The two volumes together as a record of practically obtained facts demonstrating the claims of Modern Spiritualism as to post mortal survival, are unique and overwhelming.

Every communication is from a full materialized spirit form, in good light, and either spoken audibly or written in full view by the form. There is not an automatic or trance message in the book.

It is illustrated by several engravings, the originals of which were drawn in the presence of the circle by a full form materialized spirit artist.

BEYOND THE VAIL is, as a rule, the experiences of spirits in both worlds—their own account of their lives on earth and their progress after death to their present condition of freedom from earth conditions. The narratives are intensely interesting, instructive and often highly dramatic.

Coincident with these are the profoundly philosophical comments of the controlling spirits of the seances. Prof. William Denton, Thomas Paine, Dr. W. H. Reed and others—covering, law, medicine, jurisprudence, theology and metaphysics. There are no books in existence of like character or of higher authority. Price, by mail, $1.75.

(Of the Fox Family.)

The Missing Link in Modern Spiritualism.

Thirty-three chapters, 477 pages, superbly printed, and bound in colors and gold, 15 illustrations, 5 steel engraved portraits of the celebrated Fox Family, a full page engraving of the old house at Hydesville, which to this day, by the act of its wealthy and respected owner, Artemas Hyde, Esq., bears the inscription, "Here Spiritualism Originated in 1848."

A complete history of the initiation of the movement known as Modern Spiritualism, from the epochal period which dates from March 31, 1848. Since that day, starting from a small country village in western New York, Spiritualism has made its way against tremendous obstacles around the civilized globe.

"THE UNKNOWN"

—BY—

CAMILLE FLAMMARION.

"The Unknown" created a marked sensation in France when first published and can scarcely fail to arouse the greatest interest in this country. It is an eminent scientist's study of the phenomena of the spirit world. In touching upon the various physical manifestations the author cites many absolutely authenticated instances, and chapters of his book are as weirdly fascinating as the most fantastic of Poe's tales. It treats on incredulity, credulity, hallucinations, psychic action of one mind upon another, transmission of thought, suggestion, the world of dreams, cerebral physiology, psychic dreams, distinct sight in dreams, actual facts, premonitory dreams and divination of the future, etc. 487 pages, cloth bound. SYNOPSIS OF AN ADDRESS

By John W. Ring, July 4, 1902, at Dickinson, Texas.

"We love this day,
To-day forget the cares of life,
And all that vex the weary souls of man,
Forget your passions and your party strife,
And know but that you are American."

One hundred and twenty-six years ago to-day a fearful but determined band of patriots, representing the fugitives from oppression in the old world, declared that "the United Colonies of America are and ought to be free and independent." What wonderful history was thus begun; a great nation was born, as a child, in the cradle of Justice, to be cared for by the holy ministrations of Liberty and nourished with human hope. These gallant men stood not long to plan but boldly acted in the strength of that sacred emotion, "Give me Liberty, or give me death."

A Henry could thus fire with patriotism the faltering spirit, a Paine could with "Age of Reason" and "Crisis" arouse the thoughtful; a Jefferson could frame a world-famous "Declaration of Independence;" an invincible Washington could "with equal skill, with steady power, govern in that fearful hour of horrid war or guide the ease the happier time of honest peace." In fact each place was efficiently occupied—aye, filled. The mothers (heaven's rarest gift) and daughters, and sweethearts not only kept the sacred household fires gleaming, but spun clothing to cover the oftentimes freezing forms of these noble defenders of Liberty; and moved by heaven's own inspiration they fashioned the Star Spangled Banner. The noble determination of unflinching man and the anxious helpfulness of virtuous woman thus blended opened the avenues whereby the arisen souls from the unseen world bore inspiration to these struggling mortals.

In Valley Forge, Washington received a revelation which pictured a favorable termination of the revolution, likewise the Civil and Spanish-American war. So moved by the hollest of human purposes, and strengthened by the overshadowing ministrations of illustrious men made spirits, the termination of the Revolution resulted in a thoroughly organized government, "of the people, for the people and by the people." Slowly but with unparalleled majesty the Colonies crouching along the Atlantic shores have extended not only west to the Pacific and from Lakes to Gulf, north and south, but far on the other side of the globe are possessions, also the gold-yielding Alaska. Much of these possessions have been obtained by bloody conquest, but each succeeding revolution has, true to Nature's laws wrought wondrous evolutionary developments. Not only has a new government been formed, but equally new scientific and religious ideas and thoughts have graced this people. Electricity and magnetism, though far from analyzed, have become subservient to mechanical and medical requirements; and it seems that ere long the currents of air will be extensively used in a manner similar to the great water falls which have become sources of great usefulness; the magnetic currents from the earth give promise of bearing our messages.

The growth of religious creeds in the "land of the free and the home of the brave" has awakened intense interest over the entire world. Occultism and psychism, though in many points of view transplanted from the old world, have in this new soil given growth to an illumination which has encircled the globe and rests a diadem of peace and comfort on the brow of intelligence everywhere. Again Jacob's ladder is beheld—the hosts which are descending prove to be our own loved ones whom we mourned as dead, and lo! they are "a comforter which shall lead you into all understanding." In the atmosphere of such developments the flower of Liberty blooms and emits its fragrance of tolerance and brotherhood; but truly 'tis but a fragile plant which must be nourished most carefully. A common standard of virtue should measure both sexes rather than disown our unfortunate sister and make a hero of the equally disgraceful man; capital and labor should recognize the co-operation which, for success, must exist between the two; intelligence and practical application should be the measure of power; politics should be moved by principle, not by pelf; the government, which is directly the people, should own and operate railroads, telegraphs, telephones, electric lights, etc., in municipal and federal governments; religion should be a personal matter entirely and completely separate from state relations, and breathe largely of tolerance and charity; right should be law for the sake of right; and the brotherhood of man should exemplify the fatherhood of god. And all this must and will come from careful growth and unfoldment. To the parents of the land a sacred charge is given, to instill into the lives of the children a reverence for right, equity and justice, to have them through our most excellent public schools, which are the bulwarks of our government, learn to know of, and to love, our free, man-made government, our glorious Star Spangled Banner and the common interests which will continue the growth of a nation which gives promise of even greater developments than she has yet afforded.

A NEW ORDER.

National Law and Order League of America.

We, citizens of ——, do hereby pledge ourselves to use our best efforts and our influence in correcting and suppressing vice, intemperate and moral conduct; and we further pledge ourselves to aid in prosecuting law breakers, whether of high or low degree, in carrying out the above reform. We earnestly invite the co-operation of all pure-minded, law-abiding citizens. We desire as members of this league ladies, both married and single, as well as men and young men.

This is submitted for your careful consideration, believing that if a league of this character is organized in every town and village, it will be a long step forward in social reform.

HOW TO ORGANIZE A LEAGUE.

1. Secure the signatures of twenty-five or more who wish to become members.

2. Elect a president, secretary and treasurer. Officers of the League shall be elected once a year.

3. The League shall meet every Wednesday evening for social improvement, and to discuss temperance and morality.

4. A League may be organized by applying to headquarters of National Law and Order League of America, for charter and by-laws governing the organization of leagues.

5. The expenses of organizing a League will be $2 for a charter and by-laws, and 10 cents for each member, including a pin or emblem.

6. Every subordinate League shall pay to headquarters of National League five cents for each member, the first day of every month, to be used for promoting the work.

7. Once in each year there shall be a convention held in each state, of one member from each League, to discuss the work being done in each state, and to appoint five delegates to the national convention, to be held in some city designated by the head officers of National Law and Order League of America.

8. Persons eligible to become members must lead pure, moral and temperate lives, or pledge themselves so to live.

9. Anyone committing an immoral act, or being dishonorable in business practices, or indulging themselves in the intemperate use of alcoholic beverages, shall be expelled from the National Law and Order League of America.

10. The National Law and Order League will not be dominated by any religious sect or denomination, but will earnestly ask the co-operation and assistance of all pure-minded, moral people of all denominations, to lend us their best efforts and influence, individually and collectively, to help promote this reform throughout our entire country, for the good of a benighted and suffering humanity.

11. The object of this meeting is to attain concerted action, instead of individual effort, hoping by this means to obtain permanent and lasting results. Intemperance and vice have something to sell, which makes such pursuits alluring, and money will seek investment even in the destruction of souls, just so it brings good financial returns.

12. By promulgating Truth, Justice, Temperance and Exalted Morality, and by inculcating these principles in the minds of the people, and especially the young, it cannot help having a beneficial bearing on their lives, thus producing a nobler manhood and womanhood.

13. It is appalling when people of common decency and with sane minds look around them and see so many ruined homes—and it is usually the brightest blossoms of young womanhood whose lives are destroyed by the inhuman, lecherous brutes who parade their vile carcasses through our towns and villages in defiance of our moral citizens, and our officers of the law. The National Law and Order League of America will be pledged to prosecute such offenders to the full extent of the law.

14. We claim that by promoting this reform movement it will diminish crime, and that the money wrung from the people by taxation to maintain prisons for the criminal class, almshouses for the dependents and asylums for the insane, caused by intemperance and other vices. This, together with the cost of our courts in prosecuting the criminal class would amount to enough money to sustain a Law and Order League in every town and village in the United States. There are laws to control immoral conduct and vice in all its forms, including intemperance and drunkenness; also laws regulating the sale of alcoholic liquors. But we have no officers of the law who will enforce them to the letter and without discrimination. By enforcing our police laws rigidly the example would be wholesome and deter others from committing a like offence.

Hoping the foregoing articles will interest all persons who believe in chastity, a high standard of morality and temperate living; and hoping the people will interest themselves for the benefit of humanity, by organizing Leagues and donating funds to sustain this movement, I am, Respectfully yours,

J. M. KELLEY,
Sigourney, Iowa. President.

WHY BE SICK?

Dr. J. M. Peebles the Famous Physician and Scientist Has Perfected a System of Treatment that Gives Hope to Every Sufferer.

Read His Valuable Book, "A Message of Hope"—It will Explain to You this Wonderful Treatment and Tell You How You Can be Healed.

Why will you continue to suffer when there is a treatment at hand that will cure you? Dr. Peebles and his associates, all physicians of wide experience and reputation, have perfected a system of treatment that promises health and strength to all.

J. M. Peebles, A. M., M. D., Ph. D.

Many of their cures seem almost like miracles, for hundreds of those restored had traveled far and wide, trying this doctor and that, without getting any relief and were about to give up in despair when they began the treatment of Dr. Peebles.

They are able to do such wonderful cures because they work in harmony with nature, and employ her mighty healing forces in connection with mild, scientifically prepared medicinal remedies. In a perfectly natural manner it builds up the depleted system, enriches the blood, improves digestion and assimilation, gives strength and tone to weakened nerves and muscles, and permanently repairs wasted tissues and organs, causing thousands of the sick to rejoice at being healed.

Why don't you sit down, at once, and write the doctors a plain, truthful letter as to your condition as you see it? If you will do this, they will carefully examine your case and send you a full diagnosis of your condition, and tell you truthfully whether or not they can cure you. This will cost you nothing, and if they find they can cure you, they will make their charges so small that anyone can afford the treatment.

If you are sick, write them at once for their full diagnosis and professional advice which will be sent without charge, together with their wonderful book, "A Message of Hope," which will explain fully this grand system of treatment and give you information that will brighten the remainder of your life. Esoteric Lessons.

An Argument Against Physical Causation.

The object of this book, considered a most excellent one by some, is to establish what is commonly regarded as purely physical health upon a purely psychical basis; to show that health is knowledge, wisdom, insight; that men suffer from so-called purely corporeal disease only because they form erroneous judgment; also, to show that the fundamental erroneous judgment is, that there is any such thing in the universe as physical causation, a belief in which leads both directly and indirectly to disease. Often directly in case of the individual, but more commonly indirectly as a race-belief held throughout the known history of mankind. This work is by Sarah Stanley Grimke. Price $1.50.

THE PROGRESSIVE THINKER.

SPIRITUALISM—Progress, the Universal Law of Nature: Thought, the Solvent of Her Problems.—SPIRITUALISM

VOL. 26. CHICAGO, ILL., AUGUST 9, 1902. NO. 663.

SPIRITUALISM.

The Future Life, as Portrayed by Doctor Peebles.

Dr. J. M. Peebles, during his trip in other lands, lectured in Invercargille, New Zealand. The following is a brief abstract of what he said, as reported by the Southland Times:

Yesterday evening, in the Y. M. C. A. Hall, Dr. Peebles, of Battle Creek, Michigan, U. S. A., gave his second lecture in this city on the subject of Spiritualism. The hall was crowded to the doors, many being unable to gain admission, and the lecturer was listened to with great interest by all present. Dr. Peebles, after a prayer, announced the subject to be "The Day After Death—or the Condition of Infants, Idiots, Suicides and the Wicked After Death."

He said, in substance, that the most populous city on this planet was the city of the dead. The savants of the olden times, where are they? Our forefathers and our fathers, where are they? They have gone, one by one, to swell the great congregation of the so-called dead. And what is their condition? Life and death each in their time are equally beautiful. Human beings die, not because forbidden fruit was tasted thousands of years ago, or because Napoleon crossed the Alps, but because bodies are physically organized and it is a fixed law of nature that all such bodies must become disorganized, returning dust to dust.

All Bibles may be searched—Vedic, Buddhistic, Jewish, Christian or Mormon—and only three answers will be found in them concerning the future state. These are annihilation, eternal hell torments, or the final restoration and progress of all souls to higher planes of existence. To the deep thinker, there is no such thing as annihilation, that is, the transformation of some thing or substance into nothing. The conscious soul being a detached portion of the oversoul, God, is necessarily immortal, for, as the Scriptures say, God breathed into man the "breath of life," and the Apostle declares that we are "all the offsprings of God." But if annihilation is unreasonable—unthinkable—the Calvinistic doctrine of endless hell torments for the vast majority of mankind borders upon blasphemy. Eternal hell torments is a pagan theory, and its preaching to-day makes more atheists and agnostics than all the Humes, Paines and Voltaires that ever lived. Col. Ingersoll's father was a Presbyterian preacher, and the Calvinistic dogma of election and reprobation and eternal torments drove him into infidelity, as it has thousands upon thousands. Leaving these sectarian dogmas, we pass to the teachings of spiritualism, which may be briefly thus expressed: the fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, the present ministry of angels, and spirits to demonstrate a future existence, the certainty of punishment for all wrong-doing, and the eternal progression of all souls. Infants enter the spiritual world as infants, and are there received by mothers, or matronly angels, to be educated. They there attain to spiritual manhood and womanhood. There are no absolute idiots. Blind Tom, the great American pianist, was called an idiot; but his music was masterful. Those called idiots have the divine spark within, but owing to some nervo-malformation, the spirit is not able to manifest. Death removes these obstructions and these feeble-minded unfold and become beautiful characters.

Suicides enter, at death, into those lower Tartarian spheres, because of cowardly acts, such as taking what they cannot give. Each should live to a ripe old age, and ripen gradually as do the harvest fields. In those lower spheres of densest darkness the suicide suffers bitter, biting pains of remorse and anguish of spirit, but divine punishments are disciplinary. The door of mercy is never shut. "His mercy endureth forever," sang the psalmist. God is infinitely more loving and better than any human father, and then Jesus preached to "the spirits in prison," which preaching implies the power to progress and to spiritually unfold.

The wicked, at death, enter the lower spheres of mental suffering and keenest regret; and who, among us are saints? If none enter heaven but the perfect in this world, it will be a lonely habitation. The worst have their good traits. The wisest have their failings. It is conduct, character, and the Christ-like spirit of love and wisdom that saves, and not creeds, nor old, mossy church dogmas. The good, in the process of dying, lose consciousness but barely a moment. It may be compared to a dream, waking speedily into the better land of immortality. The spasms of the dying are but the efforts of the soul, the spiritual body to burst away from its earthly bonds. The dying never weep, but often smile as they catch glimpses of the loved who have gone before. They meet their friends and know them. Our memories and our purest friendships reach beyond the grave. The spiritual world is a world of life, of activity and progress towards perfection. It is a real world—a constructive world, a retributive world with all possible means for progress, explorations, and increasing happiness. "It doth not yet appear," said the apostle, "what we shall be." This is a brief summary of the spiritual philosophy, with its accompanying signs, wonders, healing gifts, gift of tongues, and, as Paul taught, the "discerning of spirits." The apostles of Christ were spiritual mediums. Paul and Peter had trances, and John, on Patmos, clairaudiently heard music in heaven. Our modern churches, because of their narrow sectarianism and their worldliness, have lost the gifts that Christ said should "follow them that believe. They have fallen into apostasy. We pray that they may repent and become more Christly. True Christianity and the true, higher Spiritualism are in perfect accord. The most brilliant savants on earth to-day are Spiritualists. They have investigated and given in adhesion to its divine teachings. Spiritualism gives fruition for hope and knowledge for faith, inasmuch as it demonstrates a future conscious and progressive existence.

Dr. Peebles leaves for Melbourne to-day by the Mokoia, and proceeds by way of South Africa, Paris and London to America.

WHY THE SPIRITS FLED

When the Ministers Took Possession.

To the Rev. A. L. Koenoike—Good Brother:—Please accept the congratulations of the Spiritualists of St. Paul for that brilliant speech delivered by you at the weekly meeting of the Methodist pastors, in which you are reported to have said that you had recently held a camp-meeting at Merriam Park, upon the grounds occupied immediately before by the Spiritualists, but that within fifteen minutes after the Methodists arrived the spirits had disappeared.

Doubtless the profoundness of the aforesaid utterances brought down the house, and will place the author's name high upon the scroll of the literati adown the ages yet to be born.

Well, brother, Spiritualists should feel grateful for those utterances, as evidence that a Methodist clergyman may on occasions blunder onto the truth; for it could not be expected that advanced, exalted spirits of the departed, that attend a Spiritualist camp, could affiliate with a people who teach that their God caused the murder of his innocent and only begotten son, for the sins of the guilty, and that the person most conspicuous in their theology and camp is his Satanic Majesty. So Spiritualists should congratulate themselves that their friends from the life immortal feel they cannot consistently give moral support (by being present at a Methodist camp) to an institution which teaches that the most debauched criminal that ever trod the earth by simply accepting certain church dogmas at the last moment of an ill-spent life, will swing from the gallows clean (washed in the blood of the murdered son) into the Methodist walled-in, seven-by-nine heaven.

So, good brother, be it understood that the Spiritualists accept the fact that you (on the occasion referred to) blundered onto the truth, for blunder it was, for could you have perceived the reasons that so suddenly led to the exit from the grounds, of the good and wise spirits that were in attendance at the Spiritualist camp, you would never have given utterance to a truth which, in your ignorance of Spiritualism and its adherents, you intended as a stigma upon a people and a cause of which you are as ignorant as are the wildest savages of darkest Africa.

So it is the same intolerant spirit that has characterized the so-called Christian church in all the past of its history is seen cropping out at these little gatherings of the faithful.

While the propagation of liberal religious thought has made the thumb-screw and fagot impossible in this age, yet the tongue of slander is only circumscribed by the capacity of him who wags it.

In view, my good brother, of your early religious false training regarding the infallibility of the Bible as God's revealed will to the benighted children of old earth, which has so enshrouded your mind that any effort to enlighten your consciousness upon the grand demonstrated truth of spirit phenomena, and the soul-cheering spiritual philosophy, would be a fruitless task and a waste of energy, that I forbear presenting you with a summary of those elevating, soul-cheering truths, which are embraced by millions of happy peoples of to-day, in the United States.

Ever yours, for the truth.

M. T. C. FLOWER.

Asphodel Blooms.

The above is the title of a beautiful collection of poems by Mrs. Tuttle, most of which are published for the first time. They are varied in style, metre and theme, domestic, bucolic, affectional, aspirational, and a large proportion spiritual. Here is a specimen verse from a poem entitled "Fraternity":

"The grandeur and strength of nations
Lies in the mothers of men,
And the souls of a country's mothers
Are stronger than sword or pen.
O, a love for broad-browed justice,
Is the root of the noblest lives,
For justice is more than mercy
And on it all virtue thrives."

"In Love with Mother," has a pleasant ring and beautiful filial sentiment in it, and another entitled "The Land of the Living," founded upon the reply of an aged man to a remark of a friend meeting him with the query, "Are you still in the land of the living?" to which he answered, "No, but I am going there." The last verse of the poem reads as follows:

"Oh, aged man, whose silver hair
Is like the ring of glory!
God bless you for that precious truth—
Our hearts repeat the story;
And while we sit in vacant homes,
Heaven's golden bells are pealing
Along the darkness of the night,
Making the same revealing."

One more we will quote—a consolatory poem written to comfort sorrowing parents whose child had passed away from them:

"'Tis winter here, the fields are bare,
The song birds gone, the blossoms dead;
There seems no beauty anywhere
Save gleams from memory's garden shed.
But in The Far-away of Souls
Such dreary weather does not come;
The Queen of Summer days controls
In Edith's heavenly home."

Some pretty little stories by Mrs. Tuttle and her daughter, Claire, are introduced at the end of the book, which contains nearly 300 pages and several illustrations, and is bound in embossed blue cloth with silver lettering. A very nice volume for a present.—Harbinger of Light.

The Origin of Life.

NUMBER TWO.

In the previous article my aim was to show that a cause of all things must or did exist. Call it God or not, just as you please, a living, intelligent, antecedent cause must be found for that which has life and intelligence.

"Out of nothing nothing comes."

That which gave life possessed life, and that which transmitted intelligence was itself endowed with intelligence.
